

THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

THE ELIZABETHAN 'INTERPRETATIONS': A study in Elizabethan Law.

ARCHBISHOP PARKER.

STUDIES IN TUDOR HISTORY.

THE LAW AND CUSTOM OF RESERVATION, 1540-1661.

ELIZABETHAN ADMINISTRATION: An Essay in Law and Politics (3 vols.).

THE NATURE OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM.

LORD ELGIN.

THEORIES AND WORKINGS OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

STATUTES, TREATIES, AND DOCUMENTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION, 1713-1929.

ESSAYS IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

THE LAW OF NATIONALITY IN CANADA.

VISITATION ARTICLES AND INJUNCTIONS, 1536-75 (3 vols.).
(With W. H. Frere.)

TREATISE ON CANADIAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. (With A. H. F. Lefroy.)

THE LAW OF THE TAXING-POWER IN CANADA. (With D. C. Wells.)

THE LAWS OF QUEBEC, 1761-71. (With G. Lanctot.)

THE RIGHT TO TRADE: An Essay in the Law of Tort. (With J. Finkelman.)

THE LAW AND CUSTOM OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN CONSTITUTION. (With H. J. Schlosberg.)

THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA
1534—1937

AN INTRODUCTION TO ITS DEVELOPMENT LAW AND CUSTOM

By

W. P. M. KENNEDY

PROFESSOR OF LAW IN THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

SECOND EDITION

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
LONDON NEW YORK TORONTO

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
AMEN HOUSE, E.C. 4
LONDON EDINBURGH GLASGOW NEW YORK
TORONTO MELBOURNE CAPE TOWN BOMBAY CALCUTTA MADRAS
HUMPHREY MILFORD
PUBLISHER TO THE UNIVERSITY

FIRST EDITION
First impression, 1922
Second impression, 1931

SECOND EDITION
First impression, 1933

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN

To PAULINE

GILBERT BEATRICE

FRERE SHELAGH

PREFACE

THE first edition of this work, which passed through two impressions in nine years, concluded with the development of the law and custom of the Canadian constitution as it existed in 1921. At the request of my publishers I have prepared a second edition in which the original volume constitutes Part I. I am fully conscious that in recent years much new light has been thrown on this period in scholarly treatises and research which can be traced with ease in the Canadian Historical Review; but I think they serve to fill in a picture of which I have given for my purposes the essential elements. At any rate this treatise deals with the constitution, and to write of it in every aspect of its development would take up many volumes. I am content, then, to leave the first part as my broad view of the subject up to 1921. In this new edition I have added Part II which covers the years 1922 to 1937. It is impossible for several reasons to cover this period in elaborate detail. First, I have enjoyed the friendship and confidences of Canadian statesmen of all parties, and it is obvious that any expression of my knowledge must be governed by the courtesy due to this fact. I only hope that I have written with wisdom. Secondly, we do not as yet possess all the material, which some time will be available to help in filling in personal knowledge, for anything like a balanced and definitive study. Thirdly, we stand perhaps too near these momentous years to give them the careful scrutiny which a reasonable perspective will justify.

In spite of all these limitations I have attempted to view the important developments and achievements and the no less important unsolved constitutional problems in law and custom in their most vital aspects, and apart from either minutiae in statement or comprehensiveness in subject-matter. I venture to hope that this new edition, which is now sufficiently up to date to constitute a reasonable account of the law and custom of the Canadian constitution, will receive something of that kindness and generosity in reception which met the first edition. I need hardly say that I have done my best to respect confidences and to write with judgement, discretion, and objectivity. I have had no ends to serve, no ulterior motives to satisfy. The volume, however, is an expression of my personal interpretations. It is written for the general student and reader, who must not expect to find in it that comprehensiveness of legal detail which I would have given in a more technical treatise. I trust that he will find enough of interest in a singularly fascinating story of legal and customary developments.

I owe special thanks to the editors of The Law Quarterly Review, The Juridical Review, The Journal of Comparative Legislation, Politica, The Canadian Bar Review, and the Round Table for generous permission to use material which has appeared in those journals.

The dedication is personal; but I should like to hope that it will also bear witness to my devotion to my domicile of choice.

W. P. M. KENNEDY

LAW BUILDING, UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

SINCE this edition was prepared for the press, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has heard the appeals from the Supreme Court of Canada in connexion with the legislation commonly known as the Canadian 'New Deal'. The judgements are dealt with in Appendix I in a manner suitable to the purposes of this work. The Abdication of Edward VIII and the Coronation of George VI are dealt with in Appendix II in a similar manner.

W. P. M. K.

November, 1937.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

ANY historical work which attempts to traverse the whole period of a nation's life, even if it be that of a young nation like Canada, must be either an outline of events or a study of development. In this work I have essayed the latter of these, endeavouring to present to my readers neither a description nor an analysis of the political institutions of Canada, but rather an evolutionary account of the various movements and stages which have issued into the organized political life of the Canada of to-day. Canada as a political unity has a distinctive, to some it may seem an anomalous, character. It is well worth studying, both as a recent example of the process of nation-making and as a most significant illustration of that real and yet not absolute sovereignty which defies the older theories of government and thereby leads us to a truer conception of the state. I have sought to unite these two aspects in this work. To understand the former it is necessary to keep the social background always in view, to show how, under the special conditions of a new land, the conjuncture of groups detached from older countries, particularly England and France, the insistent near influence of a great neighbouring country already ahead in economic development, and the later influx of more heterogeneous elements from many lands, with all the meeting and clash of traditions which this implied, have worked in the end to a certain unity and a sure nationhood. To understand the latter it is necessary to observe how the evolution of Canadian government has constituted a decisive challenge to the absolute Austinian doctrine of sovereignty. This doctrine the very fact of the British Empire, as it has grown into a unity of self-governing peoples, by itself may be said to refute, but nowhere is that refutation so convincing as in the case of the country which names itself a Dominion and yet never hesitates in its allegiance to the mother country and to the Imperial system of which it constitutes a part. Without doubt Canada is a nation, and beyond question Canada owns a sovereignty. The situation creates both new problems and new visions. It is part of the whole world situation which the War emphasized. Absolute sovereignty in the last resort proves to be an illusory but most perilous claim in face of the facts of interdependence. While the civilized world is groping for the solution of the problem thus created, the British Empire is at least adumbrating the form which that solution must take. Canada has a special significance in this development. I have sought to bring out something of that significance in this work, and, particularly in the concluding chapter, have suggested the bearing of the Canadian situation on the whole issue of the interpretation of sovereign power. At any rate the history of Canadian constitutional development must be regarded as one of great moment, being full of achievement which once seemed to lie completely outside the possibilities admitted by time-honoured political theory.

Without attempting to record on every occasion my obligations to historians whose work has passed into the common heritage of history, I have however made every effort both in the foot-notes and in the lists of authorities to acknowledge my sources. The former are more particularly meant for students who may wish to follow the history more closely. The latter are deliberately placed at the end of each chapter, and I have, with special purpose, repeated the full titles of books. Of course, an exhaustive bibliography was out of the question, and I have only attempted to provide a working one to which reference on specific subjects can easily be made.

Finally I should like to hope that this study in Canadian history will be received as at least objective in spirit. I am quite conscious that I may have made interpretations which are incomplete or even invalid, and that I may have overlooked material which would alter or modify my conclusions. On the other hand, I have tried to follow the development with as great detachment as possible, and all that I can venture to hope is that I have made a contribution to Canadian history not quite unworthy of its romantic development, its social values, its political import, and of the genuine pleasure which it has given me since my residence in Canada.

* * * * *

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

March 18, 1922

CONTENTS

TABLE OF CASES	PAGE XXV
--------------------------	-------------

PART I. 1534-1921

CHAPTER I. INTRODUCTION	PAGE 1
-----------------------------------	-----------

The unbroken growth of constitutional development—The government of New France—Evolution through representative and responsible government to federalism—Religious liberty—Developments since 1867—Growth of Canadian national feeling—The purpose of this study.

CHAPTER II. THE GOVERNMENT OF NEW FRANCE	7
--	---

The Chartered Company—French chartered companies and constitutional life—Company of New France—Company of West Indies—Elements making for failure—A Royal Province—The administrative scheme—Authorities.

CHAPTER III. THE SEIGNIORIAL SYSTEM	19
---	----

Development of the system—Seigniorial tenures—The incidents of the system—Judicial powers—The success of the system—Its abolition—The failure of New France—Authorities.

CHAPTER IV. THE 'RÉGIME MILITAIRE', 1759-64	25
---	----

The interest of the period—The organization of the districts of Quebec, Montreal, and Three Rivers—A critical estimate—Authorities.

CHAPTER V. THE ESTABLISHMENT OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT IN QUEBEC	32
--	----

The Proclamation of 1763—Murray's Commission and Instructions—The administrative scheme of the Proclamation—Criticism of the Proclamation—Scope of Murray's Instructions—The difficulties of the situation—Murray's criminal and civil courts—Authorities.

CHAPTER VI. THE CIVIL GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC, 1764-74	39
---	----

Early note of repression—Opposition—The growth of conciliation—The difficulties created by the British in the Province—Murray's and Carleton's estimates of them—Demands for House of Assembly—The Imperial Government and the constitutional issues—Reports and suggestions for constitutional changes—Estimate of the period—Authorities.

	PAGE
CHAPTER VII. THE QUEBEC ACT, 1774	50
The passing of the Act—The new constitution—Carleton's Instructions—Carleton's dubious proceedings—The legal system under the Act—The ecclesiastical system under the Act—Carleton's attitude towards the problem of government—His dispatches prior to 1774—Their influence on the Act—The Act and the American Revolution—The motives behind the Act—The wisdom of the Act—Its results in history—Authorities.
CHAPTER VIII. THE COMING OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT	71
The influence of the American Revolution on Canada, (a) boundaries, (b) government, (c) the loyalists—Government during the Revolution—Carleton (Lord Dorchester) finds new situation after the peace—Newer demands for an Assembly—The plan for a division of the Province takes form—Official correspondence on the plan—The motives behind division—Representative institutions in the Maritime Provinces—The scheme of the Constitutional Act of 1791—The division of the Province—Discussion of the principles governing the new constitution—Authorities.
CHAPTER IX. REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN LOWER CANADA, 1792-1838	88
The organization of the Province—The first Legislature and racial cleavage—The question of language in the Assembly—Early development of French Canadianism—Milnes's estimate of the situation—The Gaols Bill—Nationalism takes form— Le Canadien —Craig's régime—The parting of the ways—The policy of conciliation—'Gens en Place'—Sherbrooke continues policy of conciliation in alliance with the clergy—The financial issue—Papineau—Dalhousie and the clash of extremes—Attempt to reunite the Provinces in 1822—Discussions on the proposal—The Assembly becomes more aggressive in financial affairs—The Imperial Committee's Report of 1828—The problem of the Civil List—The Revenue Control Act of 1831—Extremes in demands and in language—The Ninety-two Resolutions of 1834—Their weaknesses and their strength—Rebels and Constitutional Reformers—The Imperial Committee's Report of 1834—Gosford and a Royal Commission—Their Reports—The constitutional issues and Russell's Ten Resolutions—The effect of the Ten Resolutions—The appeal to arms—Suspension of the constitution—Provisional Government set up—Authorities.
CHAPTER X. REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN UPPER CANADA, 1792-1838	117
John Graves Simcoe—His conception and organization of government—The social background—'The Family Compact'—Early

CONTENTS

xv

PAGE

Reformers, Weekes, Thorpe, Wyatt, Willcocks, Jackson, Firth—The War of 1812—The political ideas of the Executive and of the Assembly—The physical background—Robert Gourlay—The political beginnings of reform—The alien question—The position of the Church of England and of the Clergy Reserves—‘Pin-prick’ repression—The Report of 1828—Colborne’s Instructions—His estimate of the situation—The Mackenzie affair—The Seventh Report on Grievances—Colborne creates rectories—The régime of Francis Bond Head—Head and his council—Head as a party leader—Reports on the Province—Authorities.

CHAPTER XI. THE FAILURE OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN THE CANADAS 156

The French-Canadian group—The recognition of French nationality—The problem of race—Race in action—The motives behind French-Canadian unrest—The failure of ’37—The political problem in Upper Canada—The struggle against privilege—The motives behind Upper Canadian radicalism—The Crown in the Canadas—The clash of legislative authorities—The political impotence of the Assemblies—The independence of the Executive—The problem of sovereignty—The gift of the experience to constitutional development.

CHAPTER XII. LORD DURHAM AND THE AFFAIRS OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA 167

Durham’s arrival and proclamation—His preconceived scheme of government—General estimate of his Report—The Maritime Provinces—The political situation there—Durham’s necessary conditions for a general federation—His estimate of the French-Canadian problem—The conditions on which he recommended the union of the Canadas—Responsible Government—‘Can authority be divided?’—Durham’s division of colonial and imperial subjects—Lord John Russell’s colonial theory—The political letters of Joseph Howe—Authorities.

CHAPTER XIII. LORD SYDENHAM’S COLONIAL SYSTEM 182

Sydenham’s mission and instructions—Russell’s analysis of the constitutional issues—His advice to Sydenham—Sydenham and the Special Council of Lower Canada—His dealings with it in the matter of the Union—His estimate of political and social conditions in Lower Canada—His practical methods in Upper Canada—The dispatch on the tenure of public offices—He pilots the measures for union through the Upper Canadian Legislature—His tact in avoiding theoretical discussions—His conception of ‘responsibility’—The Clergy Reserves—His tour in Lower Canada—Overtures to La Fontaine—Racial hatred—The necessity for local government—Reforms in Lower Canada—His growing popularity—In the Maritime Provinces—Howe and Sir Colin Campbell—The Act of Union—The orientation of parties—The 'Baldwin crisis'—Sydenham's 'Assembly'—The discussions on 'Responsible Government'—Baldwin's Resolutions—The Sydenham-Harrison Resolutions—Sydenham's system of government—Bagot's estimate—Authorities.

CHAPTER XIV. THE TESTING OF SYDENHAM'S SYSTEM 210

Bagot's suitability for the government of the Canadas—The literary quality and insight of his dispatches—Contrasted with Metcalfe—Bagot's Instructions—The ideas of the Colonial Office—The difficulties which lay before Bagot—The French-Canadian problem—Breakdown of local government in Lower Canada—Bagot's criticism of Sydenham's policy—His Executive fears to meet Assembly—Reconstruction of the Executive—Francis Hincks—The racial solidarity of Lower Canada—The implications of the Sydenham-Harrison Resolutions—Harrison and Draper advise the recognition of the French as a political party—Bagot's attitude towards Baldwin—Bagot's conviction that the Province could not be governed without the French—Lord Stanley under the influence of Sir Alan MacNab—Sir Robert Peel's advice to Bagot—Stanley's attitude towards the French-Canadians—'Multiply "vendus"'—Bagot meets the legislature—The dramatic political crisis—Bagot writes to La Fontaine and makes the offer of office—La Fontaine's conditions—MacNab's inconsistent policy—Final negotiations—Baldwin and La Fontaine in office—The storm of abuse—The news in England—Approval of Bagot's action—Conditions which governed the approval—Bagot welcomes Metcalfe's appointment—Authorities.

CHAPTER XV. SELF-GOVERNING OR CROWN COLONY 230

Metcalfe's personal character—His administrative experience—His conception of colonial government—His early analysis of the Canadian situation—The attitude of the Canadian Executive—'What is to become of the governor-general?'—Metcalfe's idea of patronage—Meeting between La Fontaine and Metcalfe's civil secretary—The meaning of executive responsibility—Different interpretations of the Sydenham-Harrison Resolutions—Metcalfe and party government—The gathering difficulties in the Assembly—Resignation of Baldwin and La Fontaine—Their defence—Metcalfe's estimate of the crisis—The pamphlet literature—Draper's provisional government—Metcalfe's position on the eve of the election—The general election—The Metcalfe régime and constitutional development—The Sherwood-Daly ministry—Baldwin on 'double majority'—Authorities.

CHAPTER XVI. THE NEW COLONIAL POLICY . . . 249

The appointment of Lord Elgin—His political outlook—The background of British opinion—Earl Grey—His dispatches to Sir John Harvey—The new colonial policy—Modifying influences—Elgin and the Canadian Executive—The governor-general's new position—Dissolution of 1847—Robert Baldwin's election address—La Fontaine and Baldwin in power—Full responsible government—Elgin and the French-Canadians—French an official language—The Rebellion Losses Bill—Elgin's constitutional attitude—The aftermath—The Annexation movement—British opinion—Hincks's defence of the new system—Free trade—The Reciprocity Treaty—Elgin and the imperial connexion—The Clergy Reserves, Seigniorial Tenure, and the ministry—The end of 'the Great Administration'—The re-orientation of parties—'Clear Grits' and 'Rouges'—George Brown—The Hincks-Morin ministry—The MacNab-Morin ministry—The rise of John A. Macdonald, G. E. Cartier, and liberal-conservatism—The settlement of the Clergy Reserves and Seigniorial Tenure—An elective legislative council—Responsible government in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island—Authorities.

CONTENTS

xvii

PAGE

CHAPTER XVII. THE FAILURE OF RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT IN THE CANADAS

270

The new position of the governor-general—George Brown on the question of the provincial capital—The significance of his speech—The tariff—The City of Sheffield and protection in Canada—Indiscretions of the Colonial Secretary—Galt's report defending Canada—Its political and constitutional importance—The problem of defence—The American Civil War—Rejection of the Militia Bill—Misinterpretation in England—The reply of the Canadian Government—Untying the formal bands of Empire—Distinction between self-government and responsible government—The failure of party government—Fundamental difficulties in the constitution—Attempts to overcome 'deadlock'—J. S. Macdonald and the 'double majority' principle—Authorities.

CHAPTER XVIII. THE GROWTH OF THE FEDERATION IDEA

283

General difficulties—Galt's proposals of 1858—Federation made a government measure—Cartier, Galt, and John Ross in England—Galt's memorial on federation presented to Bulwer-Lytton—The framework of a federal government outlined—The Canadian delegation meets in London a delegation from the Maritime Provinces—Apathy in England—The Canadian Government weakens in its support—The Reform Convention at Toronto, 1859—Proposals for federation of the Canadas rejected—John A. Macdonald supports general federation—D'Arcy McGee and Alexander Morris widen the national vision—The economic necessity for a united British North America in face of the new enthusiasm for protection in the United States—The influence of the American Civil War—Anti-British sentiment in the North reacts on the political problem in British North America—The narrowness of outlook in England—The political situation in the Maritime Provinces—Defeat of the Taché-Macdonald ministry—George Brown and John A. Macdonald come together—The negotiations for a coalition government—Difficulties over the formation of a Cabinet—Brown's venture of faith—Authorities.

CHAPTER XIX. THE COMING OF FEDERATION . . . 298

The Charlottetown Conference—Arrival of the Canadian delegates—Joseph Howe absent—The Quebec Conference—The critical situation—Details of procedure—The general principle defined and accepted—Strong bias in favour of the central government—The financial terms—The organization of the Senate—Representation in the House of Commons—The Seventy-two Resolutions—Their essential nature—Brown in London—The federation debates—The scheme approved in Canada—Disaster in the Maritime Provinces—Tilley defeated in New Brunswick—John A. Macdonald criticizes Tilley's methods—The New Brunswick situation affects Nova Scotia—Howe supports the anti-federation sentiment—Tupper temporarily postpones consideration of general federation—He gains approval for the old plan of a Maritime union—The wisdom of his course—The Imperial Government removes the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia and instructs the lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick to further federation—Prince Edward Island rejects any form of Union—Macdonald, Cartier, Brown, and Galt visit England to discuss the general situation—Death of Taché—Brown resigns—Reaction in New Brunswick in favour of federation—Tupper gains support in Nova Scotia—The Colonial delegates in England—Westminster Palace Hotel Conference—Difficulties and discussions—Galt and education—Various drafts of a bill—'The Kingdom of Canada'—The passing of the British North America Act—The public opinion of England—The first federal ministry—The beginnings of conventions in the formation of a Dominion Cabinet—The first federal elections—Federation supported except in Nova Scotia—Tupper alone returned—The demand in Nova Scotia for repeal—Howe in London—Tupper opposes him with the Imperial Government—The Imperial Cabinet refuses to act—Tupper and Howe discuss the situation—Howe returns doubtful—The good offices of Tilley—Howe joins the federal Cabinet—Authorities.

CHAPTER XX. THE DOMINION OF CANADA . . . 322

The Western Lands—Rival Companies—Selkirk's Settlement—John A. Macdonald begins to urge expansion—The Dominion Parliament addresses the Crown in favour of uniting to Canada Rupert's Land and the North-western Territory—The Rupert's Land Act of 1868—Negotiations with Hudson's Bay Company completed—'The Northwest Territories—The Red River Rebellion—The formation of the Province of Manitoba—The political development of the North-west Territories—Alberta and Saskatchewan—The organization and government of the Yukon and the North-west Territory—Vancouver Island—Governor Douglas—The first legislature of Vancouver Island—British Columbia—Projects for the union of the Pacific colonies—Political, economic, and social difficulties—Governor Seymour in opposition—The two colonies united—Growth of sentiment in favour of union with the Dominion—The Yale convention—Governor Musgrave urges the plan—Full responsible government—The terms of union agreed on and union with Canada accomplished—The final refusal of Newfoundland—The political independence of Prince Edward Island—Financial difficulties in Prince Edward Island—Sir John Rose approaches John A. Macdonald—Reopening of negotiations—Prince Edward Island enters federation—The Railway Builders—From Ocean to Ocean—Authorities.

CHAPTER XXI. THE DEVELOPMENT OF CANADIAN AUTONOMY

339

‘The Canada First Party’—Blake’s Aurora speech—Limitations on Canadian self-government—Blake and the creation of the Supreme Court—Blake brings about modifications in the powers of the governor-general—His memorandum on the status of the Dominion—The history of the development of Canadian control in trade treaties—The creation of the office of high commissioner—Difficulties in England over the matter—The Canadian Cabinet outlines Canada’s position—Galt appointed high commissioner—He looks to a federation of the Empire—J. A. Macdonald’s conception of the office and functions of high commissioner—Discussions over methods of procedure in negotiating trade treaties—The agreements of 1895 and 1907—Difficulties over ‘most-favoured nation’ clauses—The principles at present holding in arranging trade treaties—The Radiotelegraphic conference—Political treaties—Developments within the limitations imposed by international law—Quasi-political agreements—Canadian ministers admitted to the Committee of Imperial Defence—Military and naval defence—Gradual withdrawal of Imperial forces—The Dundonald affair—The constitutional basis of Canadian defence—Debates on the Canadian Naval Act of 1910—Laurier’s position—The advent of Sir Robert Borden—The Senate rejects his naval programme—The dispatch of December 10, 1912, on Imperial defence—Sir R. Borden accepts principle of a Canadian minister in London—He sees the implications of Canada’s taking part in the defence of the Empire—He claims a share for Canada in foreign policy—Sir George Perley goes to London—The Colonial and Imperial Conferences—Canada’s attitude—The agreement of 1907 for consultation between Governments—An estimate of the history before 1914—The emphasis on Canadian autonomy—The outbreak of the War—The legal consequences for Canada of the Imperial declarations—The Imperial Government careful not to infringe Canadian autonomy—Sir Robert Borden emphasizes in England Canadian status—The new Government in England in 1916—The creation of the War Cabinet—Canadian ministers invited to attend—Mr. Lloyd George explains the scheme—Sir Robert Borden lays stress on the new situation—The Imperial War Conference of 1917—Resolution on the status of the Dominions and of India—The War Conference of 1918—Discussion on channels of communication with the Imperial Government—The matter referred to the War Cabinet—The present arrangements governing such communications—Discussion of the term 'Cabinet'—The Imperial Conference of 1921—Canada at the Peace Conference—The significance of Canadian signatures to the Peace Treaty—The unity of the Empire—The law of the ratification—The League of Nations—Canada's position—Canada and membership of the Council of the League—The difficulties of the Covenant—'Canadian nationals'—Parliamentary discussions of the Treaty and the League—Mr. Doherty's theory of 'nationhood'—Sir Robert Borden's conception of the present position of the problem of Empire—The federal elections of 1921—No discussions of constitutional difficulties—Authorities.

CHAPTER XXII. THE FRAMEWORK AND SCHEME OF GOVERNMENT

378

General outline of the British North America Acts—The Crown in Canada—'The Privy Council'—The office and status of the governor-general—The lieutenant-governors—The federal Executive—Conventions in relation to its formation—Cabinet responsibility—The governor-general and the Cabinet—Dismissal of ministers—Dissolution—The provincial Executives—The recall of lieutenant-governors—The Parliament of Canada—The Senate—Distribution of membership—Appointment of extra members by the Crown—Constitutional rules governing the choice of a senator—The Senate and finance bills—The House of Commons—Constitutional rules governing the number of members—Qualifications for membership—Electoral districts or ridings—Controversy over constituencies—The pact of 1903—The history of the federal franchise—The Dominion Elections Act of 1920—Regulations governing an election—Procedure in the House of Commons—The French and English languages—Speaker and Deputy-Speaker—The Leader of the Opposition—The Legislative Councils of Nova Scotia and Quebec—The provincial Houses of Assembly—Limitations on a province in changing its constitution—The privileges of the Canadian legislatures—The judicial system—The tenure of judicial offices—The federal courts—The anomalous position of divorce—Appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—Authorities.

CHAPTER XXIII. THE NATURE OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

PAGE

400

Vagueness of the conception of proposed unions in Canadian history—Lord Durham's definitions—The meaning of the term 'Confederation' in American history—Vague use of terms in Memorandum of 1864—J. A. Macdonald's use of the terms 'Federation' and 'Confederation' in 1865—Dorion challenges the lack of clearness—'Provincial rights'—The Privy Council and the British North America Act—The Dominion Parliament not a delegate—The provincial parliaments not delegates—The sovereignty of the Canadian legislatures within their reference—Lord Watson's conception of the Act of 1867—The effect of federation on the provinces—Criticism of Lord Haldane's definitions of Canadian federalism—The Canadian Senate—The Canadian Cabinet—The office of lieutenant-governor—The Dominion power of disallowance—The history of provincial Acts which have been disallowed—Principles on which such disallowance has been based—'The golden age of provincial rights'—Joseph Chamberlain on the principle of responsible government—Sir Allen Aylesworth's dicta—Revival of disallowance by Mr. Doherty on principles apparently abandoned—Criticism of Mr. Doherty's position—Dicta of Mr. Justice Riddell—Cartier's conception of the power of disallowance—Delegatus non potest delegare.

CHAPTER XXIV. THE DISTRIBUTION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER

433

Education—Agriculture and immigration—The Dominion powers—The provincial powers—Limitations on discussion—The distribution of power considered as a whole—The federal 'residuary power'—The completeness of legislative power in Canada—The general test of the validity of any Act—The recognition of alternative aspects in the testing of the validity of an Act—Intrusion of federal legislation on provincial legislation and vice versa—Authorities.

CHAPTER XXV. THE IMPERIAL TIE

445

The real position of Canadian influence in Imperial affairs—The bands of freedom—The limitations on Canadian autonomy owing to the Imperial tie—The weakness of current terms in describing the Empire—Canada's status in international law—Canada 'under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland'—The 'right' of secession—The constitutional method of dissolving the Imperial connexion—The League of Nations strengthens the Empire—The governor-general—Legislation by the Imperial Parliament for Canada—Extra-territorial jurisdiction—Difficulties in changing the Canadian constitution—These impose severe limitations on Canadian autonomy—The problem of foreign affairs—

Canada not a sovereign state—Canada's status illustrated from a possible state of war—Canada has no powers to declare neutrality—The possibilities of advance in the functioning of the League of Nations—The Austinian and absolute state—The necessity for abandoning the old theories of sovereignty—'Sovereignty' must conform to facts—Political unity and final authority—The dangers of premature constitutions and of the régime of doctrinaires.

PART II. 1922-1937

CHAPTER XXVI. TENDENCIES IN CANADIAN ADMINISTRATION 461

The law relating to administration—Reasons for its development—Influence of cabinet government—Examples of delegated legislation—Amending powers—The crown in council—Declaration of policy—The real problems of delegation—Judicial and extra-judicial control—Parliamentary scrutiny—The attitude of the courts—Ousting the courts—Justification of administrative law—Criticism of the system—Procedure against the crown.

CHAPTER XXVII. ASPECTS OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND CUSTOM 484

Nationality—Married women—Legislative powers—Methods of interpretation—Marriage and divorce—Trade and commerce—Radio and aviation—Women senators—Honours—Executive powers—Disallowance and reservation of provincial and federal statutes—The Byng episode of 1926—The governor-general's appointment—His relations to his ministers—Criticism of his instructions—Diplomatic representation—Mr. Massey at Washington—Foreign diplomats at Ottawa—Treaty-making—The Halibut Treaty—Treaty of Lausanne—Treaty-making at the imperial conferences of 1923 and 1926—Treaties in the name of the King—The relation inter se of the British nations—Treaties and the league of nations.

CHAPTER XXVIII. CANADA AND THE STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER 514

Canadian preliminaries to the Statute of Westminster—The address of the house of commons—The recitals and definitions—The King's title—'King of Canada'—'Dominions' and 'domains'—Future legislation in the United Kingdom—Imperial sovereignty and unity—The Colonial Laws Validity Act—Repugnancy—Extraterritoriality—Appeals to the privy council—Safeguarding the British North America Acts—Constituent powers—Proposals for change—The past and future.

CONTENTS

xxiii

	PAGE
CHAPTER XXIX. CANADA IN THE BRITISH COMMON-WEALTH	540
Canada in the league of nations—War—The implications of the unity of the crown—Parliament and war—Neutrality and its difficulties—Secession—Foreign policy in parliament—The delicate balance of federation—The Balfour 'equality'—Canada's control over its destiny.
APPENDIX I. THE CANADIAN 'NEW DEAL'	545
APPENDIX II. THE ABDICATION OF EDWARD VIII: THE CORONATION OF GEORGE VI	555
APPENDIX III. THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867	567
INDEX	595

TABLE OF CASES

A

	PAGE
Abbott v. City of St. John	40 S. C. R. 595 405
Angers v. Queen Insurance Company	22 L. C. J. 307.. . . . 417
Ashby et al, In re	[1934] O. W. N. 336 478
Attorney-General of Australia v. Colonial Sugar Refining Company	[1914] A. C. 237 408
Attorney-General of British Colum- bia v. Attorney-General of Canada	[1914] A. C. 153 440
Attorney-General of British Colum- bia v. Attorney-General of Canada	[1936] S. C. R. 363; [1937] A. C. 368 545-6
Attorney-General of British Colum- bia v. Attorney-General of Canada	[1936] S. C. R. 398; [1937] A. C. 377 546
Attorney-General of British Colum- bia v. Attorney-General of Canada	[1936] S. C. R. 384; [1937] A. C. 391 546
Attorney-General of Canada v. At- torney-General of Alberta	[1916] 1 A. C. 588 440, 491
Attorney-General of Canada v. At- torney-General of Ontario	20 O. R. 222 392
Attorney-General of Canada v. At- torney-General of Ontario	[1898] A. C. 700 422
Attorney-General of Canada v. At- torney-General of Ontario	[1932] A. C. 54 493, 546
Attorney-General of Canada v. At- torney-General of Ontario	[1936] S. C. R. 461; [1937] A. C. 326 546-8
Attorney-General of Canada v. At- torney-General of Ontario	[1936] S. C. R. 427; [1937] A. C. 355 548-9
Attorney-General of Canada v. Cain and Gilhula	[1906] A. C. 542 406
Attorney-General of Ontario v. At- torney-General of Canada	[1896] A. C. 348 442, 443
Attorney-General of Ontario v. At- torney-General of Canada.. . .	[1936] S. C. R. 379; [1937] A. C. 405 549-50
Attorney-General of Ontario v. At- torney-General of Canada	[1912] A. C. 571 440
Attorney-General of Ontario v. Mer- cer	8 App. Cas. 767 415
Attorney-General of Quebec v. Queen Insurance Company	3 App. Cas. 1090 442

	B	PAGE
Bank of Toronto v. Lambe	12 App. Cas. 575	440
Baxter v. Ah Way	8 C. L. R. 626	464
Board v. Board.. ..	[1919] A. C. 956	396
Board of Commerce Act, In re ..	[1922] 1 A. C. 191	491
Board of Education v. Rice	[1911] A. C. 179	477
Booth v. The King	(1915) 51 S. C. R. 20	471
British Coal Corporation v. The King	(1935) 51 T. L. R. 508	494, 521, 525, 526, 552
Brophy v. Attorney-General of Mani- toba	[1895] A. C. 202	421, 434
	C
Campbell v. Hall	20 St. Tr. 239	36
Canadian Pacific v. Ottawa Fire In- surance Company.. ..	39 S. C. R. 405	440
City of Toronto v. Canadian Pacific	[1908] A. C. 54.. ..	444
City of Winnipeg v. Barrett	[1892] A. C. 445	433
Corporation of Three Rivers v. Sulte	5 L. N. 332	417
Crown Grain Company v. Day ..	[1908] A. C. 504	395
	D
Dansereau, Ex parte	19 L. C. J. 210.. ..	392
Doyle v. Bell	11 O. A. R. 326	444
Dyson v. Attorney-General	[1911] 1 K. B. 410	465
	E
Edwards v. Attorney-General of Canada	[1930] A. C. 124	493, 552-3
	F
Fielding v. Thomas	[1896] A. C. 600	393
Florence Mining Company v. Cobalt Lake Mining Company	18 O. L. R. 257	427
	G
Goodhue, In re	19 Grant 366	417
Guay v. Blanchet	5 Q. L. R... ..	417
	H
Hodge v. The Queen	9 App. Cas. 117	406, 421, 464, 491
	I
Initiative and Referendum, In re ..	[1919] A. C. 935	392, 398, 411-12
Institute of Patent Engineers v. Lockwood	[1894] A. C. 347	471

TABLE OF CASES

xxvii

J

	PAGE
John Deere Plough Co. v. Wharton..	[1915] A. C. 330 437, 443

K

Kazakewich v. Kazakewich	[1937] 1 D. L. R. 548 533
--------------------------------	---------------------------------

L

L'Association St. Jean-Baptiste v.
Brault	31 S. C. R. 172 395
Legislative Jurisdiction over Hours of Labour, In re	[1925] S. C. R. 505 547
Liquidators of the Maritime Bank v. Receiver-General of New Bruns- wick	[1892] A. C. 437 407, 415
Local Government Board v. Arlidge	[1915] A. C. 120 477, 479
Low Hong Hing, In re	[1926] 3 D. L. R. 692 480

M

Maher v. Town of Portland	Wheeler 362 433
McCuaig v. Keith	4 S. C. R. 648 397
McCulloch v. Maryland	4 Wheat. 416 530
Montreal Street Railway v. Montreal	[1912] A. C. 333 443

N

Nadan v. The King	[1926] A. C. 482 524, 525, 526
---------------------------	--------------------------------------

O

Ontario Separate Schools v. Mackell	[1917] A. C. 62.. .. 433, 434
-------------------------------------	-------------------------------

P

P.A.T.A. v. Attorney-General of Canada	[1931] 2 D. L. R. 1 492, 553
Powell v. Apollo Candle Company..	10 App. Cas. 282 464

R

Regina v. Burah	3 App. Cas. 889 464
Regulation of Radio Communica- tion, In re	[1932] A. C. 304 493, 545, 547
Rex v. Inspector of Cannon Row Police Station	(1921) 37 T. L. R. 856 471
Rex v. Minister of Health: ex parte Yaffe	[1930] 2 K. B. 98; [1931] A. C. 494.. 471
Rivett-Carnac's Will, In re	(1885) 30 Ch. D. 136 496
Russell v. The Queen	7 App. Cas. 829 442, 491
Russell v. Rex	The Times , June 22, 1920 398

S		PAGE
Severn v. The Queen	2 S. C. R. 70	417
Smith v. City of London	20 O. L. R. 133	426
St. Catherine's Milling Company v. The Queen	14 App. Cas. 46	428
T
Théberge v. Laundry	2 App. Cas. 102	395
Toronto Electric Commissioner v. Snider	[1925] A. C. 396	491, 493
U
Union Colliery Company v. Attor- ney-General of British Columbia	27 S. C. R. 637.. .. .	394
V
Venicoff, ex parte	[1920] 3 K. B. 95	480
Vertieul v. Knaggs	[1918] A. C. 557	479
W
Walker v. Walker	[1919] A. C. 947	396
Watts v. Attorney-General of British Columbia	[1908] A. C. 573	396
Whittaker v. Durban	36 T. L. R. 784	399
Wilson v. Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway	[1922] 1 A. C. 202	479

PART I
1534-1921

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTION

CANADIAN constitutional development begins in the ages of absolutism and grows down the centuries. We can trace the stream of evolution with comparative ease, and though it is a long journey back to the rock of paternalism which French pioneers struck in the pathless wilderness, yet even to-day in the full flood of liberty it is possible to discern in the mingled waters something of the far-off source. Circumstances now and then changed the direction of the current, and it is quite easy to point to these; but the changes of direction could not prevent the stream from reaching inevitably the ocean of constitutional life. The persistent onflow lends a romantic fascination to Canadian history. In the spheres of political and constitutional liberty, of religious toleration, and of local autonomy within an empire, its course can be followed from point to point. To-day, political thinkers are watching a newer problem arise inexorably out of those already solved—the formal reconciliation of full Canadian citizenship with full citizenship of the British commonwealth.

The government of New France was paternal absolutism. Only during the régime of Frontenac does a momentary gleam of what political philosophy would call liberty appear. Until the fall of Canada, centralized control, bureaucracy, and royal supervision characterized the administration. Nor is there any evidence that the Canadians during this period longed for any share either in central or in local government. Indeed they looked somewhat askance at the English experiments in the colonies to their south, where the constant bickerings, political and ecclesiastical, did not tend to impress an apathetic and simple people with any desire for popular control. The British conquest did not bring to the Canadians any miraculous political conversion, and the somewhat arbitrary rule which continued in Canada to 1791 was as logical for the 'new subjects' as that under the French crown. The change of flags merely substituted, as Burke said, George III for Louis XVI.

In 1791, when Canada received representative institutions such as already existed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the gift was forced by the unforeseen advent of the American Loyalists; and while it conferred on French-Canadians a primary education in political freedom, it withheld the fully developed scheme of responsible government. As a matter of fact, the recognition of what appears nowadays to be the necessary corollary of representative government lay outside the range of contemporary political thought. When responsible government in the modern sense of the term came into practice in 1849, it was not before the colonial office and the imperial government had spent many a bad quarter of an hour over a tantalizing problem of sovereignty, and the Canadians had learned in the hard school of experience, in which rebellions played a part, something of the duties which are the spiritual values of legal forms or constitutional conventions. Indeed, in Canada legal form curtailed the growth of the constitutional convention of cabinet government. The fact that the Act of Union of 1840 gave to Canada East and to Canada West equal representation, irrespective of population, in the united legislature which that Act set up, robbed Lord Elgin's experiment in 1849 of the full and complete implication of self-government. With the coming of federation in 1867, Canada at last obtained the widest application of representative and responsible institutions.

In relation to the growth of religious liberty it is possible to trace a somewhat analogous development. It is true that a few Huguenots came to New France in the experimental stages of French colonial rule, yet as early as 1627 they were excluded by the charter granted in that year to the Company of New France, and this prohibition virtually banished protestants from the colony. Whether this injunction was due to religious intolerance or to the growing belief in the political principle cuius regio eius religio or to a blend of both is of little importance. The fact remains that New France after 1627 was developed as a Roman catholic colony with the ecclesiastical machinery of a province immediately subject to the Holy See. After the cession of Canada appearances seemed to point to a reaction in a protestant direction. For a short time it seemed possible that the 'new subjects' would receive a bare religious toleration. It is not surprising then, considering the letter of the law in England at the time, that there was much searching of hearts over the ambiguous phrase in the peace of Paris of 1763: 'The new Roman catholic subjects may profess the worship of their religion according to the rites of the Romish church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit.' The Quebec Act of 1774 was, however, a distinct step forward. It is interesting to find the reactionary group, represented by North, opposing the leading liberals of the day, represented by Burke and Fox, in fathering and carrying through a British parliament in the eighteenth century an act which not only granted to Roman catholics the free exercise of their religion, but also gave powers to the Roman catholic church to collect the customary dues from its members by process of civil law as in the days of the French régime. Legalists, it is true, continued to play with the fact that the freedom was subject to the Elizabethan Act of Supremacy; but the concession in respect of church dues practically repealed that enactment and endowed the Roman catholic church. On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that the church of England was the established church of the province, and that both before and after 1791 it enjoyed privileges such as no other organized religious body possessed. Its endowment in 1791 by means of the clergy land-reserves produced an agitation which culminated in the loss of its peculiarly privileged position. It may be said that religious toleration is one of the corner-stones of the Canadian constitution.

Since federation in 1867 there have been signs of further growth. Canada has assumed actual control of her military forces and written out into realities the constitutional powers given her in this sphere of national life. ✓ The governor-general is now appointed with the full goodwill of the Canadian government, and he can no longer carry out in Canada functions which in England belong only to the crown acting through responsible ministers. ✓ Shading across the thin dividing line between constitutional and economic life, the developments are no less remarkable. Indeed, in trade relations they are almost spectacular. During the French régime trade was kept firmly under the thumb of the minister at Paris. With the advent of British rule, Canada came under the economic system perpetuated by the navigation laws. Canadian trade was controlled entirely by the mother country. 'England holds her colonies for the sole purpose of extending her commerce' was the trite summing up of Hugh Finlay, a Canadian deputy-postmaster of the period. After 1791 the barriers were gradually lowered. Canada was allowed bit by bit to trade with other countries, until the advent of the free-trade school in England brought colonial politics into touch with the principles of laissez-faire and finally led to the abolition of the last remnant of the navigation laws in 1849. Canada was not slow to take advantage of the new situation. In 1854 Lord Elgin negotiated a reciprocity treaty with the United States on behalf of Canada, and in 1859 a tariff barrier was actually erected against Great Britain which has continued to the present day. ✓ Within recent years Canadian trade autonomy has been conceded. ✓ The position of adviser has become one of negotiator. These examples serve to illustrate the beginnings of a wider freedom, until to-day it is recognized, on the one hand, that commercial treaties binding the empire as a whole are hardly possible without consent ; and, on the other hand, that a trade treaty can be negotiated by Canada with the cognizance of the imperial government. It is true that grave difficulties have arisen which the Great War prevented from being discussed ; but that an advance has been made of considerable importance no one can deny.

✓ The growth of Canadian autonomy has been accompanied by the growth of national feeling. ✓ This development gives guarantees to the constitutional advances already made and also postulates future problems for solution. That such a development must come was clear to the fathers of federation. The American Civil War without and the tragic political differences within lent special emphasis to the question of Canadian unity in those pregnant autumn days in 1867, when, under the shadow of party deadlock in Canada and of the neighbouring tragedy of disintegration, political faith made a new venture into the unknown. Canada began with a lesson learned. She avoided, as John Macdonald said, ‘the great source of weakness in the United States’—the centrifugal force of ‘state rights’. But something more was implicit in the lessons learned from the first great experiment in federal government. They contained the germs of Canadian nationality, national sentiment, national feeling, national loyalty—a fatherland. ✓ The citizens of Canada are first of all Canadians and secondly citizens of a particular province. The ideal of national unity to which the constitutional experiment of 1867 gave weight is symbolized in the lines of connecting steel. New provinces have grown up within the federation and have unconsciously accepted a national outlook. Canadians have grasped the significance of Canada, and they went out into the great adventure of war to preserve the inheritance through which their maturity was attained.

✓To-day, Canada is a distinct national group. A federation, it is true, but with a genius for balancing centrifugal and centripetal forces. ✓Canada possesses all the problems peculiar to a nation; but a nation within an empire. To the future belongs the giving of a constitutional form to this new experience in history. In that further development lies Canada's crown of constitutional self-consciousness.

The aim of this book is to trace the stream of development. The mere retelling of a well-known story lies more or less outside its purpose. It is rather an attempt to find in the facts the complex characters and divers conditions out of which they grew; to seek the causes which gave energy and purpose to the constitutional evolution; to animate dead documents with something of the vital energy which called them into being. It is an attempt to judge by historical standards the gradual expression of a people's political life in constitutional forms and to estimate them in the light of their constructive contribution to human history.

CHAPTER II

THE GOVERNMENT OF NEW FRANCE

WHEN, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, colonial expansion began to interest the nations of northern Europe, the chartered company seemed a practical and economical method of exploitation and of government. The organization of these companies might differ in detail and their relations to the state might vary, but it is not surprising that many colonizing nations made use of them, considering that the state of European finance did not permit a further drain on the national exchequers. The romance of discovery might have remained a mere romance much longer, had not these colonizing states been prepared to incorporate private companies which would bear the risks of opening up new lands. Of course, the monarchs, in return for royal licences, insisted on a share in the gains where such accrued, but the scheme offered a ready solution to a new problem at the smallest cost to the nation, while at the same time it preserved the national authority. France naturally copied her neighbours, and in the French adventure in Canada there was nothing original except the variety of imitation. The earliest French schemes bore analogies to English companies. Later, the Company of New France and the Company of the West Indies were not unlike the chartered trading companies of Holland. It was only after experiment in this method of administration that New France passed under direct royal control, in imitation perhaps of Spain and Portugal.

Before 1627 the student of constitutional history gains little of value from the study of the various charters granted to private individuals and companies. Indeed, from Cartier's taking possession of Canada in 1534 till the advent of Richelieu in French colonial affairs, the period is largely a blank owing to the pressure of religious wars on the French government and people. The emphasis, too, in these early charters obscured constitutional issues. The powers of government which the trading monopolies carried with them were wide and far reaching, but the primary interest was exploitation rather than colonization and constitutional experiment. The concessions granted in 1540-1 to Cartier's associate are typical.¹ As the king's lieutenant-general he was given 'full authority and power'. He could make laws, edicts, statutes, ordinances—political and otherwise. He could 'create, constitute, establish, dismiss and remove captains, justiciars, and generally all other officers as shall seem good to him'; and, according to one version,² he had powers to 'punish either by corporal death or any other exemplary punishment'. Roberval's patent became a model, and its influence can be traced in the charters granted to the companies which down to 1627 carried on such government as there was in Canada. It was only after the pacification of France by the Edict of Nantes in 1598 that France resumed her colonizing efforts. The crowding, however, of six trading and administrative monopolies into less than thirty years left little place for constructive government.³ For the moment the failure, both economic and constitutional, of these early companies need not be considered; but no analysis, however minute, of the charters under which they were incorporated would throw much light on experiments which were so short-lived. The years are too full of insecurity, of inexperience, of war, and of mistrust. Their history is rather that of trading posts than of real colonial beginnings.

¹ H. Harrisse, Notes pour servir à l'histoire . . . de la Nouvelle-France, pp. 243 ff. (Paris, 1872).

² In Harrisse this passage is corrupt. See Collection . . . de Documents relatifs à l'histoire de la Nouvelle-France, vol. i, pp. 30 ff. (Quebec, 1883).

³ The company of Pont-Gravé & Chauvin, 1599; of De Chastes, 1602; of De Monts, 1603; of Rouen, 1613; of De Caën, 1620; of Montmorency, 1622.

When, in 1624, Richelieu became 'Grand-master, chief and superintendent-general of the commerce and navigation of France', and thus acquired a controlling influence in French colonial adventure, it was not long before his fertile brain was busy with plans transcending mere private enterprise. Already his romantic imagination had laid the dream-foundations of a French empire in the new world, and soon he was playing with the organization of a huge company which would gather up and control with imposing efficiency all the overseas ventures of France. Practical politics, however, won the day for less cumbersome machinery. Under his guidance several new companies were formed, and in 1627 the destinies of Canada were entrusted to the Company of New France, otherwise known as the Company of One Hundred Associates. The list of shareholders indicates the entrance of the big interests. The smaller traders of the earlier companies are replaced by merchant adventurers of the capital, by noblemen, by officials from the court and public departments with Richelieu at their head. A new era seemed to have dawned. With the provision that half of the twelve controlling members must reside in Paris, of capital adequate for favourable beginnings, of two royal ships each year, and of a large trading monopoly, the Company of New France might well look forward to carrying out its part of the bargain. Even though Huguenots were excluded, it need not have been difficult to bring out a few hundred settlers in 1628 and four thousand before 1643.¹

The administrative scheme also gave promise of success. No longer was a lieutenant-governor to act as viceroy. New France became part of the feudal territory of the crown, from whom the new company held direct 'en toute propriété, justice et seigneurie'. The actual government was delegated to a governor, nominated by the company and appointed triennially by the king. This royal supervision shows the growing importance of colonial expansion ; but the scheme was at first experimental, and the governor was as powerful as the old lieutenant-governors and commandants had been. Indeed, he exercised almost unlimited sovereignty.¹ In 1647 an attempt was made under royal decree to curb his arbitrary powers. A council was organized, consisting of the governor, the Jesuit superior in New France, and the governor of Montreal, to whom was granted authority previously exercised by the governor alone. The change, however, did not furnish sufficient guarantee against high-handed action, and in the following year the inhabitants succeeded in getting the council reorganized. To the governor, Jesuit superior (acting until a bishop should arrive), and retiring governor were added from two to three representatives elected conjointly by the other members of the council, and the syndics of Quebec, Montreal, and Three Rivers. This introduced a popular element into the council, since the syndics themselves owed their position to direct popular favour.

¹ See the charter in Édits, Ordonnances Royaux . . . concernant le Canada, pp. 5 ff. (Quebec, 1854).

The dim light of political freedom did not last long. Owing to a combination of causes, remote and immediate, the whole scheme disappeared in 1663. Among the latter may be included the arrival of Laval as Vicar-apostolic in 1659 with the title Bishop of Petraea in partibus infidelium—a triumph for the Jesuits in their unedifying dispute with their new rivals, the Sulpicians. Almost immediately church and state entered into a contest for authority, and petty details of procedure cumber the history of these years. Out of rather small incidents in an age-long struggle, the governor's correspondence awoke the French monarch's interest in the possibilities of development, which was further stimulated by Laval's presence in France. The charter of the Company of New France was taken back into the king's hands and New France became a royal province. The conflict of powers in the colony coincided with Colbert's advent in 1661 as chief minister, and his influence in the councils of Louis XIV soon made itself felt. If his advice is not directly seen in the abolition of the Company of New France, it is certainly clear a year later in colonial affairs.

¹ See, for example, the commission, June 6, 1645, to Montmagny granting him powers, as governor, 'de juger souverainement et en dernier ressort', Complément des Ordonnances et Jugements, pp. 15 ff. (Quebec, 1856).

The new machinery of royal government had scarcely begun work, when Colbert undertook a plan which had been in his mind since the beginning of his régime. Although not officially in charge of colonial interests till 1669, he early conceived the idea of making a magnificent challenge by means of two aggressive corporations to gain for France the suprématie mondiale to which the chartered commercial companies of England and Holland already laid proud claim. He aimed to beat them at their own game with similar weapons, and accordingly New France was handed over in 1664 to the new Company of the West Indies and remained under its control until 1674. The company was modelled on the Dutch West India Company, and it began its work with almost sovereign powers, backed with large finances and personally supported by the king and Colbert. However, its influence on the government of Canada was practically unimportant, and for the purposes of this study the period of royal government may be dated from 1663.

Within less than a century eight chartered companies had administered the affairs of Canada. The first and most obvious impression which they make is that of their brief duration and the witness which it bears to failure. It may well be asked what causes lay behind. Perhaps the clearest is the lack of consistency in policy, and of stability in purpose. While the companies received amazing powers, the very width of the grants guaranteed royal influence. Monopolies and sovereign authority made demands on their funds for religion, for exploitation, for administration, for justice, for war, and not infrequently to buy the royal ear or to close it against the jealous whispers of would-be rivals. But there were deeper reasons for failure. In not a single instance did any chartered company keep its part of the bargain in bringing out the stipulated number of colonists on which its monopoly was founded. It may be true that the Jesuits did not want colonists and that a voluntary supply was cut off by the exclusion of the Huguenots. On the other hand, such a company as that of New France carried on an exceedingly profitable trade, while concealing the real resources of the country and discouraging serious settlers.¹ The great developments of the period were in the religious sphere, but these failed to convince Louis XIV and Colbert that the imperial idea was being realized. The need for a more stable policy and for more serious colonizing effort became at last apparent, if France intended to become a serious rival in the new world. After one final and futile experiment with a chartered company, France turned almost instinctively to its own provincial system, and proceeded to apply to New France the traditional organization of a French province—an organization which lasted till the fall of Canada a century later.

When allowance is made for lack of uniformity, it is broadly true to say that the majority of French provinces were administered by a governor, an intendant, and a bishop, with a parlement or a sovereign council. As the centralized state developed and gathered strength, the wide powers granted to the provincial governors were curtailed. Indeed, the office of intendant originated in a desire to curb their influence and authority. So successful was the experiment, that the intendant soon left to the governor merely the ceremonial trappings of control. The provincial bishops and their place in the plan represented the peculiar relationship between church and state in France. The parlements and sovereign councils acted in judicial capacities, and where the latter existed, they possessed spheres of authority which elsewhere belonged to the intendant alone. The divisions, however, which the tripartite nomenclature suggests were by no means mutually exclusive. The scheme was rather one of overlapping and of dove-tailing, in which no element should become too powerful and each should act in dependence on the others. It was a characteristic product of highly organized bureaucracy.

¹ Consult an estimate of settlers from 1608 to 1645 by M. Benjamin Sulte in Transactions of Royal Society of Canada (2nd series, vol. xi, sect. ii), pp. 99 ff.; and from 1682 to 1666 in 'Report on the Ethnological Survey of Canada' by the same author (British Association for the Advancement of Science, Report, 1900, pp. 470 ff.).

¶ The transition from government by a chartered company to government as a royal province was easily accomplished in New France, as much of the machinery lay ready at hand. A governor and bishop were already in the colony and the council of 1648 could easily be reconstructed as a sovereign council. The new instrument of government—Édit de Création du Conseil Souverain—was issued in April 1663.¹ A sovereign council was created consisting of the governor, the bishop, five councillors, an attorney-general and secretary.² Any vestige of popular control disappeared, vacancies being filled by the governor and bishop jointly, and later by the king alone. The Édit de Création is silent about an intendant, though one was appointed in 1663. Talon, the first to hold the office in New France, did not arrive till 1665.

The workings of the system differed almost necessarily from that in France. Distance from the central authority and the unknown vastness of a new country combined, to the end, to militate against complete similarity. At first, with untamed Indians ready to wipe out the little colony and with the English to the south full of suspicions and ready to take offence, the governor gained much power owing to his military office. The bishop, too, began with experience in the country, and this fact gave him an initial influence which his missionary character confirmed. He was not bound down by the well-organized details of a complete diocesan life. Conflicting orders from France did not tend to simplify procedure or to encourage the development of similar provincial administration. Indeed, strong personalities alone made up later for the difficulties created in government through the lack of an intimate knowledge of colonial affairs by officials and ministers in France.

¹ Édits, Ordonnances Royaux . . . , vol. i, pp. 37 ff.

² The councillors were increased to seven in 1674 and to eleven in 1703.

The governor was the king's personal representative and commander-in-chief of the forces of the crown within the province. Up to 1674 he was president of the sovereign council. Ousted by the intendant, with royal approval, his influence declined to that of a powerful councillor. On the other hand, governors like Frontenac and Beauharnois, relying not only on their military office but on those conditions which left room for the play of strong personality, could carry out high-handed actions, which, however, always incurred the risk of royal displeasure unless the circumstances could be used to prove the necessity of abnormal proceedings. The intendant was in the most real sense 'the royal man'—the personification of the king's authority. As a general rule, his influence was irresistible. Always in close personal communication with the minister, he passed, from being at first a spy on governor and bishop, to a position of the widest authority, to which his theoretical third place in colonial precedence made little difference. Up and down the province, his activities touched every phase of colonial life. At one time he is settling seigniorial disputes, at another giving judgement in some commercial or criminal case. And it was quick and ready justice. 'Everybody pleads his own cause', wrote La Hontan, 'our Themis is prompt, and she does not bristle with fees, costs and charges.' At another he is busy with public health, with roads and bridges, with Sunday observance, with offensive chimneys, with breaches of rules on the frozen streets of Quebec, or with new immigrants. On almost every conceivable affair he issued regulations which as a rule carried with them force and authority. In the finances of the colony, in taxation, and expenditure he was practically supreme. To help him in his multifarious work, he called in local organization.¹ For the dispensation of justice the province was divided into three districts—Quebec, Montreal, Three Rivers—in each of which was a court of first instance. The administrative unit was the ecclesiastical parish, where the intendant employed the captains of militia as his local representatives. They promulgated his edicts and judgements. It is a singular testimony to the moral calibre of the thirteen men who actually filled the office in New France that, with one or two exceptions, they bore with honesty and clean dealing the no light burden of colonial administration. In the routine of government, with a strong governor or a strong intendant, the bishop's public and official influence gradually declined, and his attendance at the council became less and less regular. But as bishop of Quebec he held no empty title. In 1703 he obtained the right of having a deputy on the sovereign council, and no affairs of importance passed without careful ecclesiastical scrutiny. As often as not, where business interests were liable to overshadow moral issues, his authority could read lessons to the civil officials. Indeed, the colony always remained in many respects a theocracy, in which the church's power, manifest in episcopal office, never could have become merely spiritual. Cartier's huge cross with the fleur-de-lis standing on the shores of Gaspé was a symbol of New France.

The sovereign council had powers as a court of registration and justice as well as in financial administration and legislation. The latter power, as we have seen, passed largely to the intendant. Its change of name in 1674 from sovereign council to superior council bore witness to the gradual loss of much of its authority. To the end its judicial powers remained ; but even here much of its actual work passed to the king or to the intendant. When Canada fell the superior council possessed little of the authority which had been granted to it under the Édit de Création.

¹ For an excellent survey of local administration see P.-G. Roy, 'Les officiers d'état-major des gouvernements de Québec, Montréal, et Trois-Rivières sous le régime français' (La Revue Canadienne, 1917).

The note which runs strong through the whole royal organization is one of paternalism. For one moment, in 1672, Frontenac attempted a change, perhaps as part of his challenge to consolidate the civil power against the church. He called at Quebec an assembly of clergy, nobles, and the third estate—the States General of New France. The outcome was a severe official dispatch from Colbert : ‘ Your assembling of the inhabitants of the country to take the oath of fealty and your division of them into three orders or estates may have had a good effect for the moment ; but it is well that you should observe that you are always to follow in the government and administration of this country the forms in use here ; and, since our kings have long regarded it as for the good of their service not to call together the States General of the kingdom, in order perhaps to abolish insensibly that ancient institution, you on your part should very rarely, or to speak more correctly, never, give this corporate form to the inhabitants of the said country. You should even, as the colony grows stronger, suppress insensibly the office of syndic, who presents petitions in the name of the inhabitants ; for it is well that each should speak for himself and no one for all.’¹

¹ ‘ L’assemblée et la division que vous avés faite de tous les habitants du pais en trois Ordres ou Etats pour leur faire prêter le serment de fidélité pouvoit produire un bon effet dans ce moment-là, mais il est bon que vous observiés que comme vous devés toujours suivre dans le gouvernement et la conduite de ce pais-là les formes qui se pratiquent ici, et que nos Rois ont estimé du bien de leur service depuis longtemps de ne point assembler les Etats Généraux de leur Roiaume pour peut-être anéantir insensiblement cette forme ancienne ; vous ne devés aussi donner que très rarement, et pour mieux dire jamais, cette forme au corps des habitans dudit pais, et il faudra

The dispatch throws an intimate light on the principles of government. After 1674 the king resumed much of the power originally granted. He made all the chief appointments, and his ministers were not above correspondence with the lesser colonial officials. He became a court for direct appeals. Even minor details, such as ordering to a convent an indiscreet colonial widow, came within his supervision and could command his attention. Regular reports reached him personally in which characters were pulled to pieces in terms of bitter rivalry, and by these the king regulated his frown or smile. The administration was meticulous in its royal supervision, and it was assuredly no ignorance of colonial dispatches that lost New France. An estimate, however, cannot be made before some consideration is given to the seigniorial system.

[AUTHORITIES.—The important documents are in : Collection . . . de Documents . . . relatifs . . . à la Nouvelle-France (4 vols., Quebec, 1883-5) ; Édits, Ordonnances Royaux . . . concernant le Canada (Quebec, 1854) ; Complément des Ordonnances et Jugements (Quebec, 1856) ; Arrêts et Règlements du Conseil Supérieur de Québec, et Ordonnances et Jugements des Intendants du Canada (Quebec, 1855) ; Jugements et Délibérations du Conseil Souverain de la Nouvelle-France (4 vols., Quebec, 1885-8) ; Jugements et Délibérations du Conseil Supérieur de Québec (2 vols., Quebec, 1889-91) ; Correspondance Générale, and the Collection Moreau St. Méry in the Canadian Archives ; Ordonnances des Intendants (4 vols., Archives de Québec, 1919) ; Insinuations du Conseil Souverain (Archives de Québec, 1921). The early trading charters are discussed in H. P. Biggar, The Early Trading Companies of New France (Toronto, 1901). The best general discussions of early colonial policy are in É. Salomé, La Colonisation de la Nouvelle-France (Paris, 1906), and J. Chailley-Bert, Les Compagnies de Colonisation sous l'ancien régime (Paris, 1898). Special studies are M. Eastman, Church and State in Early Canada (Edinburgh, 1915) ; W. B. Munro, 'The Office of Intendant in New France' (American Historical Review, October 1906) ; R. D. Cahall, The Sovereign Council of New France (Columbia University Studies, 1915) ; J.-Edmond Roy, L'Ancien Barreau au Canada (Montreal, 1897) ; G. Doutre and E. Lareau, Le Droit Civil Canadien (Montreal, 1872). Valuable information is contained in the Reports of Murray, Burton, and Gage (1762), printed in A. Shortt and A. G. Doughty, même avec un peu de tems, et lorsque la Colonie sera encore plus forte qu'elle n'est, supprimer insensiblement le syndic qui présente des requestes au nom de tous les habitants, étant bon que chacun parle pour soi et que personne ne parle pour tous' : Colbert to Frontenac, June 13, 1673, Collection Moreau St. Méry, 1670-6, Série F, vol. 178, p. 208.

Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1759-1791, pp. 47 ff. (Ottawa, 1918). F. Parkman, The Old Régime in Canada, and A. Shortt and A. G. Doughty (editors), Canada and its Provinces, vols. i and ii, have been used throughout. The last work, in 23 volumes, is here generally acknowledged for the whole of this book, as well as L. J. Burpee and A. G. Doughty, The Makers of Canada: Index and Dictionary of Canadian History (Toronto, 1911).]

CHAPTER III

THE SEIGNIORIAL SYSTEM IN NEW FRANCE

EVERY charter which accompanied a trade monopoly included powers to create seigniories in New France, but with the early failures in colonization the creations were comparatively few. It was only after the colony had passed under royal control in 1663 that the seigniorial system became a reality. The main credit is due to the intendant Talon, whose vigorous immigration policy from 1665 to 1672 laid the foundations of an almost inconceivable advance, when the régime of the chartered companies is recalled. Such episodes as the disbanding of the Carignan-Salières regiment and the granting of seigniories to its officers helped the policy, to which the king and intendant devoted time, energy, and money. When Gédéon de Catalogne made his report in 1712 on the seigniories of Quebec, Three Rivers, and Montreal, he found that several million acres had been granted, of which, however, only fifty thousand were under cultivation.¹ Various tenures characterized the system. Analogous to free and common socage were those known as en franc aleu noble and en franc aleu roturier, the former carrying with it a patent of nobility. Corresponding to frankalmoign was that of en franche aumône, under which religious foundations obtained large grants. The most common tenures, however, were en fief or en seigneurie, en arrière-fief, and en censive or en roture.

The seignior held direct from the crown, en fief or en seigneurie, taking an oath of fealty or homage at the castle of St. Louis in Quebec. He bound himself to perform military service, to provide a map and census of his lands, to pay a relief ¹ when the seigniori passed into other hands except by direct succession, and after 1711, to sub-infeudate his seigniori on pain of forfeiture ²—an obligation peculiar to Canada and one which did much towards populating the seigniories. Grants en arrière-fief or in sub-seigniori were few in Canada, as the seignior preferred to grant his lands en censive or en roture. This tenure, which was invariably ignoble, governed the holdings of the censitaire or habitant. He was obliged to pay annually to his seignior cens et rentes: nominal money-payments or payments in kind or both, according to the terms of the grant. The corvée called him to work a stipulated number of days each year, but this he could commute for a money payment. He owed to his seignior lods et ventes, corresponding to the relief of seigniorial tenure and governed by the same rules, except that the amount was only a twelfth of the mutation price. In addition, he came under certain obligations governed by the droit de banalité, and the seignior could compel him to make use of the seigniorial grist-mill and bake-oven at a stipulated price. As a matter of fact, the seigniors were lax in providing mills, and the banality in connexion with ovens appears to have been exercised in only one instance.³ As often as not it was the censitaires who appealed to the governor and council for the protection of their rights under the droit de banalité.

¹ Printed in W. B. Munro, Documents relating to the Seigniorial Tenure in Canada (Toronto, 1908), and in the Bulletin des Recherches Historiques, 1915.

Judicial powers did not necessarily accompany every seigniorial grant. The droit de justice, while it appears usually to have been conferred, was an expressly given right. As a general rule, the seignior possessed high, low, and middle jurisdiction—haute, moyenne et basse justice—the extent of his jurisdiction had no relation to the area of his seigniority. A grant of haute justice covered all criminal cases except against the person and property of the crown, and it included punishment by death or mutilation. In civil cases it was all-embracing. Moyenne justice included lesser criminal and civil cases, and basse justice covered all petty cases. Theoretically these rights were great, in practice they were hardly a severe burden. There is no recorded instance of the death penalty being imposed, and most of the seigniors were content to let the royal courts exercise all haute justice. The seigniorial courts usually confined their activities to disputes over land and titles and to the many local bickerings. Indeed, there was little encouragement for the seignior outside a desire for power to hold courts.

¹ The relief was also known as 'the quint', as it amounted to one-fifth of the mutation price of the seigniori.

² Édits, Ordonnances Royaux . . . , pp. 324 ff. (Quebec, 1854).

³ W. B. Munro, 'The "Droit de Banalité" during the French Régime in Canada,' Annual Report of the American Historical Association, 1899, vol. i, pp. 207 ff.

It is something of a surprise that a system which was honey-combed with decay in seventeenth-century France should be introduced into a new country and have continued there for more than two centuries. The seigniors of France had ceased to carry out their obligations. The court of an all-powerful sovereign was more attractive than provincial life, and too often the absentee landlord's only interest in his seigniority lay in the hard-wrung remittances from his bailiff. In Canada conditions allowed the revival of the system in its primitive freshness, and when we recollect the essence of feudalism, its introduction need cause little surprise. The military protection which it afforded was very useful to the little colony against Indians and English, while the simple social life provided opportunity for many of the best sides of seigniorialism to flourish. There the seignior lived in close touch with his people—their leader and protector in battle, their supporter and patron in peace. His privileges were not troublesome, and the general customs of life and work in New France were not corrupted by the class hatred of centuries. It is not too much to say that the introduction of the seigniorial system gave to New France its most enduring element. It was a source of strength for every colonizing scheme. In some degree it took the place of municipal institutions, and it gave the colony a military organization much superior to anything which the Thirteen Colonies possessed.

Autres temps, autres mœurs. With the fall of Canada and the gradual elimination of paternalism the system finally became an anachronism. Sentimental attachment alone can explain its survival till 1854, when seigniorial tenures were converted by the parliament of Canada into a general tenure en franc aleu roturier, free from all feudal service.¹ From the constitutional point of view the system thus disappeared from Canadian history; but relics of it linger, as many of the habitants did not take advantage of the legislation of 1854 to compensate their seignior by a lump sum, and the terms 'rentes constituées' and 'seigniors' can still be heard in the language of modern Quebec.

The system of French colonization was defective in theory and practice. We are forced to make use of the threadbare comparison between French and British methods, as it still remains the best illustration. Both nations employed companies to advance their colonial enterprises, but the inherent difficulty with those French companies which had any pretence to reality was their dependence on the state. They thus lacked the creative initiative of the British type, and they were too easily made and unmade. Time, so necessary in colonization, waited on political and royal caprice. Even when as a royal province New France was most successful, it was an attempt to set up in Canada the old régime. It derived its life from above. Its vitality depended not on roots in the native soil, but on the benevolence of a distant despotism. Everything was organized on a system of perpetual political tutelage. Britain, on the other hand, cared for nothing outside commerce, and soon the unhampered colonists outstripped the motherland in political thinking, in independence of outlook, and in the conception of liberty. Thus, on the one side lie political apathy, indifference to citizenship—a paternal theocracy where everything was done for the colonists, not by them ; on the other, the keenest interest in the theory of government, ‘ a fierce democracy ’, as it has been described, a belief in popular consent, a general political self-reliance, a wide flourishing through neglect. What New France gained as a unit was lost in lack of initiative, and what New England lost as a unit was recovered by those lasting qualities which lie behind and postulate development. The lack of initiative in New France killed its political unity for practical purposes, and Montcalm could tell a sorry enough tale of the closing scenes. New England’s possession of initiative made up finally for the lack of unity and brought that unity as a certain development in the necessary hours of New England’s history. Without disparaging the statesmanship of Chatham, the brilliant combination of Saunders and Wolfe, the more brilliant military achievements of Amherst, and the heroic defenders of the colony, the failure of New France lay deep in the nature of things, independent of the devious ways of diplomacy or of the caprice of the god of battles. The idyllic dream settlements along the St. Lawrence were not made of the stuff for endurance in a new continent, where the vigorous group-life of Anglo-Saxon pioneers was preparing lessons in political experiment destined to change the civilized world.

¹ 18 Victoria, c. 3.

It may be asked, then, Why trouble to survey the constitutional history of New France ? Is it not wasted energy to study a system so lacking in permanence ? A moment’s thought, however, will show that it is impossible to understand Canadian constitutional development without some such survey. The complete answer will appear running through the history ; but it may be well to note here that every important landmark in Canadian history bears marks of New France. Indeed, there are few other cases in the world’s history where a conquered people have left, within such a short period, so many permanent impressions on the government set up by their conquerors. An isolated institution such as the shire-court may survive and prove of extraordinary importance in constitutional development ; but we no longer seek the origins of our greatest constitutional principles or institutions in Anglo-Saxon history. At every step in modern Canada we are forced inevitably back to that romantic failure which in reality triumphed on the Heights of Abraham.

24 THE SEIGNIORIAL SYSTEM IN NEW FRANCE

[AUTHORITIES.—The most complete work on the seigniorial system has been done by Professor W. B. Munro in The Seigniorial System in Canada : a Study in French Colonial Policy (New York, 1907) ; Documents relating to the Seigniorial Tenure in Canada (Toronto, 1908) ; ‘ The Seigneural System ’ in Canada and its Provinces, vol. ii, pp. 531 ff., with an excellent bibliography in vol. xxiii, pp. 239 ff. The workings of the system can be followed in J.-Edmond Roy, Histoire de la Seigneurie de Lauzon (6 vols., Montreal, 1897–1907) ; M. Benjamin Sulte provides records and ordinances in ‘ Le Moulin Banal ’ in his Mélanges Historiques, vol. v (Montreal, 1920).]

CHAPTER IV

THE 'RÉGIME MILITAIRE', 1759-64

FRENCH colonial possessions on the North American continent only gradually passed under the British flag¹ and the introduction of British institutions was equally gradual. It is best to postpone the constitutional history of those possessions, known in British history as the Maritime Provinces, as it fits in with the general discussion of representative and responsible government, and to continue the history under British rule of the settlements along the valley of the St. Lawrence. After the fall of Quebec in 1759, delay over the final peace made a period of military rule inevitable.² This period, known in Canadian history as the 'régime militaire', did not leave permanent marks on the development, but it is important that it should be considered for several reasons. Round this earliest point of contact between British officers and Canadian civilians has gathered an unfortunate tradition which needs examination. The actual history has become somewhat obscured and requires disentangling. Finally, within these years sprang up a friendship between the military chiefs and the French-Canadians which cannot be overlooked in the background of evolution.

In 1759 General Monckton, who had assumed command of the forces at Quebec, was granted leave on account of his wounds, and he appointed the next senior brigadier, James Murray, military governor of Quebec, with Colonel Burton as lieutenant-governor, until the king's pleasure should be known.¹ As soon, however, as Montreal capitulated, General Amherst issued a 'placard' appointing Colonel Burton governor of the administrative district of Three Rivers, and General Gage governor of the administrative district of Montreal.² The arrangements of Monckton and Amherst thus continued the three French divisions of government. Murray had already begun his work and made his plans for the district of Quebec, and he was not bound by Amherst's instructions to Burton and Gage. The date and source of his appointment produced in Quebec a type of military rule quite different from that in Three Rivers and Montreal.

¹ Nova Scotia in 1713, Cape Breton in 1758, Citadel and district of Quebec in 1759, the remaining French possessions in 1760.

² Military rule lasted from September 18, 1759, to the establishment of civil government, August 10, 1764. The peace of Paris was signed February 10, 1763, but the introduction of civil government was delayed, because the terms of the peace allowed eighteen months to any Canadians who might wish to leave the country.

While Murray was penned within the ramparts of Quebec in the months following Wolfe's victory, he appointed one of his officers, Colonel Young, to act as judge in civil and criminal cases within the city and its environs. A little later, on January 16, 1760, he extended the administrative machinery by appointing a seignior, Jacques Allier, civil and criminal judge 'for the well-being and profit of the inhabitants of the parish of Berthier and those lying beyond as far as Kamouraska inclusive'.³ In the following October he issued an ordinance establishing a system of military courts.⁴ For criminal and the more important civil cases, as well as for petitions and requests, the governor held a court every Tuesday. Here he might act summarily, or he might refer such cases as he thought fit to the 'military council' or 'council of war' which assembled

¹ Murray to Pitt, October 8, 1759 (A. and W. I., vol. lxxxviii); John Knox, An Historical Journal of the Campaigns in North America for the years 1757-1760, vol. ii, p. 241 (ed. A. G. Doughty, 3 vols., Toronto, 1914-16).

² Placard from his Excellency General Amherst, September 22, 1760, A. Shortt and A. G. Doughty, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1759-1791, pp. 40 ff. (Ottawa, 1918).

³ Ibid., p. 37.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 44 ff.

bi-weekly. All minor cases were left for trial 'to the commandant of the troops in each locality', subject to appeal 'to the military council if the case pertains thereto and there is reason for it'. Within the district of Quebec the administration of justice thus passed into the hands of British officers.

In Three Rivers and Montreal other arrangements were made. When Amherst organized these administrations, he set up courts of first instance composed of French-Canadian militia officers, who were as far as possible to settle amicably all disputes and differences and to execute justice. Cases in which an immediate decision was not possible were to go before the officer commanding the troops in the district. Serious cases and all appeals were to be dealt with by the governor.¹ Amherst's instructions to Burton and Gage illustrate his plan and show the spirit in which he acted: 'Take upon you the administration of the whole, governing the same, until the king's pleasure shall be known, according to the military laws, if you should find it necessary; but I should choose that the inhabitants, whenever any differences arise between them, were suffered to settle them among themselves agreeable to their own laws and customs.'²

In October 1761 Gage reorganized the administration of his government, dividing it into five districts with 'a chamber of justice' in each, composed of French-Canadian militia officers presided over by a captain. The court sat fortnightly for civil and criminal cases, and had powers to inflict corporal punishments, to imprison, or to fine. The more serious cases, such as felony or murder, were sent to trial before British courts martial, which sat monthly for each group of two subdivisions. All decisions were subject to the approval of the governor, who might lessen or excuse the punishment, but might not increase it.¹ In the following year Haldimand, who had succeeded Burton at Three Rivers, organized a similar scheme. Conditions are well illustrated by the fact that a proclamation suspended the ordinary administration of justice from August 7 to September 15, in order that those in charge might attend to their duties on the farms.²

¹ Ibid., pp. 40 ff.

² Amherst to Burton, Camp of Montreal, September 16, 1760. Colonial Office Records, M. 216, pp. 250 ff. (Canadian Archives).

When an estimate is made of the 'régime militaire', it is possible to accept the statement of a modern French-Canadian historian: 'the archives prove that the military régime, instead of being capricious and harsh, was gentle and paternal.'³ We can afford to neglect the sweeping attacks on the period and such statements as that the Canadians 'spurned the booted and spurred legalists placed among them', preferring to settle their disputes before the priests. The animosities of later years have unfortunately coloured the history of this period.⁴ As a matter of fact there was plenty of law; Murray noted the general 'litigious disposition' of the people,⁵ and Haldimand complained that his captains of militia were worried by the extraordinary love for litigation and by the incompetence of Canadian lawyers.⁶

Leaving out of consideration the private manuscripts of the period, we find from the official documents of the time that the predominating administrative aim was conciliation through equity in a mixed régime of martial and French civil law. This spirit went so far that British officers used the French language in speech and writing when they desired to communicate with this downtrodden people!⁷ Gage himself bore

¹ G. Doutre and E. Lareau, Le Droit Civil Canadien, pp. 503 ff. (Montreal, 1872).

² Ibid., p. 533.

³ J.-Edmond Roy, L'Ancien Barreau au Canada, p. 70 (Montreal, 1897).

⁴ 'Les Canadiens repoussèrent les juges éperonnés', &c., F. X. Garneau, Histoire du Canada, vol. ii, pp. 372 ff. (Québec, 1852).

⁵ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 53.

⁶ Haldimand to Amherst, June 22, 1762, Haldimand Papers, B. 1, 192 (Canadian Archives).

⁷ See the documents quoted and commented on in M. B. Sulte, 'Le Régime witness to the policy. It was with high satisfaction that he reported that during his command he had made it his constant care and attention to see that ' the Canadians should be treated agreeable to his majesty's kind and humane intentions. No invasion on their properties or insult on their persons have gone unpunished. All reproaches on their subjection by the fate of arms, revilings on their customs or country, and all reflections on their religion have been discountenanced and forbid. No distinction has been made betwixt the Briton and Canadian, but equally regarded as subjects of the same prince. The soldiers live peaceably with the inhabitants and they reciprocally acquire an affection for each other.'¹ Murray recorded that even those who were deceived by ' the many arrant falsehoods and atrocious lies ' of interested persons were won over by the ' lenity, the impartial justice that has been administered '. The general feeling between the soldiers and the inhabitants was one of ' harmony unexampled at home '. When war and famine had fallen hard on the people, British officers of every rank subscribed largely for relief, and private soldiers ' threw in their mite or gave a day's provisions or a day's pay in the month '.² He flattered himself that no military government was ever better conducted than his had been, and that he had gained the affection and gratitude of the Canadians,³ who themselves acknowledged that Murray and his military council administered to them ' all the justice that we could have expected from the most enlightened jurists '.⁴ The seigniors declared their love for Murray as the ' father ' and ' protector ' of the people. They praised his charity, wise decisions, and Militaire, 1760-1761' (Proceedings and Transactions, Royal Society of Canada, 2nd series, vol. xi, pp. xxvii ff.).

¹ Gage to Amherst, March 20, 1762, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 91 ff.

² Murray to Amherst, June 5, 1762, ibid., p. 80.

³ Letter Book of General Murray, vol. i, January 26, 1764 (Canadian Archives).

⁴ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 227.

mildness of administration, resulting in a tranquillity which almost made them forget their mother country.¹

If there existed material for trouble, it lay in two spheres, that of religion, where freedom was at issue, and that of finance, where bills of exchange created difficulties.² When the colony was invaded by the British, the church thundered against the heretics and schismatics. The fall of Montreal brought an official change, but the curés obeyed the letter and not the spirit of the episcopal orders. There was a general suspicion lest the freedom of religion granted at the capitulations would be changed.³ Murray noted the importance of the problem, and Gage analysed the state of mind with astute criticism. A working arrangement with France over the thousands of bills of exchange which had been issued by the French officials to pay for the army, removed to a large extent one source of dissatisfaction; but from the days of the ' régime militaire ' the fears with regard to religion never entirely disappeared. It is significant that when, in days to come, French-Canadian patriotism, strengthened by racial and political trouble within and revolutions without, sought concrete expression in propaganda, religion was not entirely forgotten, though guarded and guaranteed by Act of parliament.

The ' régime militaire ' need cause no regrets to the conquerors. It compared more than favourably with French rule in the Palatinate and along the banks of the Rhine and with the lot of the Acadians. For the conquered it brought a long-desired peace, an opportunity to resent attempts at seigniorial arrogance and ' to dispute the tithes with the curés '. Military rule, just and equitable, made little difference to a people who had no abstract idea of patriotism. The truth is that both in

¹ Canadian Archives Report, 1888, pp. 19 ff.

² Cf. Gage to Egremont, February 12, 1763, and Murray to Halifax, October 23, 1763, State Papers, Q. 1, pp. 64, 250 (Canadian Archives).

³ Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759-1915, pp. 6, 10 (Oxford, 1918).

Canada and in France, on the eve of the peace of Paris, there were no regrets. Voltaire's plans with Choiseul and Mme de Pompadour to force the abandonment of the colony, and his luxurious celebration of the fact in his château at Ferney, reflected the general French attitude.¹ In Canada the habitants at the hour of their abandonment found in British officers kindly step-fathers; and with looks half turned across the Atlantic and half turned to the kindly conquerors, they accepted a decision of the sword which was tempered with uniform consideration and humanity.

[AUTHORITIES.—The most important documents are in A. Shortt and A. G. Doughty, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1759-1791 (Ottawa, 1918); in the Haldimand Papers and the State Papers, Q. 1-Q. 2 (Canadian Archives); in Doutre and Lareau, Le Droit Civil Canadien (Montréal, 1872). Interesting sidelights are found in the Letter Books of General Murray (Canadian Archives). The main authority for the period is Règne Militaire en Canada . . . du 8 septembre 1760 au 10 août 1764 (Mémoire de la Société historique de Montréal, No. 5, Montréal, 1870). Miss J. N. McIlwraith's Sir Frederick Haldimand (Toronto, 1904) contains valuable material from the Haldimand Papers.]

¹ See a valuable note in F. X. Garneau, Histoire du Canada, vol. ii, app. i, pp. 719 ff. (cinquième édition, Paris, 1920).

CHAPTER V

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT IN QUEBEC

THE far-flung Seven Years War at last reached an official end with the signing of the peace of Paris, February 10, 1763, and all the French possessions in North America, except the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, were ceded to Great Britain. During the negotiations Canada was weighed in the balance against Guadeloupe, so little were its possibilities understood.¹ To contemporary eyes it was 'a place fit only to send exiles to, as a punishment for their past ill-spent lives'.² Great Britain, however, felt the necessity of relieving the Thirteen Colonies from the French menace which had irritated them so long, and Canada passed to the British crown. Apart from this deciding issue, Canada was a mere detail in an unsolved problem in which predominated vast unsettled lands, Indian trade, and European settlements outside organized administration.

When the British government began to turn its attention 'to the establishment of civil government in the territories ceded by the treaty', the efforts made to disentangle the various difficulties were neither clear nor definite. At first, care was mostly directed to the affairs of settlement and of the Indians, and a proclamation was planned dealing with these matters. Later, provisions were introduced into the proclamation creating and defining four distinct and separate governments—Quebec, East and West Florida, and the island of Grenada—but to each was granted an identically vague system of law and administration, without the slightest attention being paid to differences in development, population, and political experience. The royal proclamation of October 7, 1763, gave Quebec its first civil government under British rule.¹ The ambiguous terms of the grant and the fact that they were due to an after-thought illustrate the initial casual interest in the administration of the province. In the following November, however, a commission² was issued appointing Murray 'captain-general and governor-in-chief in and over our province of Quebec in America', and this was amplified a month later by more detailed instructions.³ Civil government was actually established on August 10, 1764.⁴ Murray had thus three documents to guide him: the royal proclamation, his commission, and his instructions.

¹ See an interesting discussion of contemporary opinion in W. L. Grant, 'Canada versus Guadeloupe: an Episode of the Seven Years War' (American Historical Review, July 1912, pp. 735 ff.).

² General Murray's Correspondence, bundle viii (Canadian Archives).

The proclamation, as far as the new province of Quebec was concerned, merely outlined an administration for the settled parts of New France.⁵ The boundaries were such that the western country, with its trading posts extending to the prairies and to the Mississippi valley, was left under the control of the department of Indian affairs and outside the government of Quebec. Executive authority was placed in the hands of a governor and council. The former was instructed, 'so soon as the state and circumstances of the said colon[y] will admit thereof', to call a popular assembly similar to those in the

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 18 ff.

² Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 173 ff.

³ Ibid., pp. 181 ff.

⁴ See above, p. 24, note 2.

⁵ 'The government of Quebec, bounded on the Labrador coast by the river St. John, and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river through the lake St. John to the south end of the lake Nippissim; from whence the said line, crossing the river St. Lawrence, and the lake Champlain, in 45 degrees of north latitude, passes along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea; and also along the north coast of the Bay des Chaleurs, and the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosières, and from thence crossing the mouth of the river St. Lawrence by the west end of the island of Anticosti, terminates at the aforesaid river of St. John.'

Thirteen Colonies. Power was given to the governor, council, and contemplated assembly to make laws, statutes, and ordinances. No provision, however, was made for legislation apart from 'the representatives of the people so to be summoned as aforesaid'. When it is remembered that one of the main reasons for introducing administrative clauses into such a miscellaneous document was 'to increase as much as possible the number of British and other new protestant settlers',¹ the proclamation is exceedingly indefinite. The promise of an assembly is in itself remarkable, seeing that Murray had already assured the government that the country was not at all ripe for such an institution,² but apart from an assembly no hint of legislative power is given. The proclamation rested satisfied with the smug assurance, 'that until such assemblies can be called as aforesaid, all persons inhabiting in or resorting to our said colon[y] may confide in our royal protection for the enjoyment of the benefit of the laws of our realm of England'. The judicial system was to consist of civil and criminal courts governed by law and equity 'as near as may be agreeable to the laws of England', with the right of appeal in civil cases to the privy council.

When the proclamation is submitted to criticism, it is clear that the interval between its earlier and final form had not provided any adequate conception of Canadian affairs. The documents of these months disclose neither insight nor knowledge. To cut off the western lands from the civil jurisdiction of the province merely helped to alienate the merchants of Montreal and Quebec, whose business in the western trade was Canada's strongest hold on economic prosperity. The conditions thus created remained unchanged until they were rectified in 1774 after pressure from the colonists. Nor did the provision for calling an assembly display any more enlightenment. To set up such an institution in a province overwhelmingly Roman catholic would have meant the passing of political power into the hands of two or three hundred protestants who alone could act as members according to the laws of England. A racial and religious oligarchy must arise unless 'the state and circumstances' necessary for an assembly included the arrival of a vast concourse of 'British and other protestant settlers'. The regulations for the legal system bristle with ambiguities. If they contemplated the disappearance of French law, they were impracticable. A social upheaval, in which the old seigniorial and contractual systems were destroyed, alone could justify such a course. On the other hand, it would have been a difficult problem to decide how nearly 'agreeable to the laws of England' a completely different civilization could be brought without destruction.

¹ Lords of Trade to Egremont, June 8, 1763, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 142. Cf. same to Halifax, October 4, 1763, ibid., p. 156.

² Murray to Egremont, June 7, 1762, State Papers, Q. 1, p. 23 (Canadian Archives).

On the negative side the proclamation was also weak. In addition to the omission of a proviso fully explaining the source of legislative power, nothing was said on the subject of taxation. Presumably Great Britain had assumed the duties in force in New France, but no plans were made for their collection, and taxation remained on an unsatisfactory footing for a decade.¹ With regard to religion there was a dangerous silence, in view of the state of mind already noted as existing under the 'régime militaire'. Nothing was done to define the position of the Roman catholic church. The peace of Paris begged the issue. It promised that the king's 'most precise and effectual orders' would guard his new subjects in the profession of their religion. The gracious goodwill may have been free from guile, but the royal ministers were careful to add a saving clause, 'as far as the laws of Great Britain permit'. It was a nice point to decide how far the recusancy laws of England governed Canada. Finally, the whole proclamation was called in question¹ by the argument that the king apart from parliament could make no laws binding Quebec, and it was not till 1774 that such doubts were quieted by Lord Mansfield in Campbell v. Hall.² That judgement not only decided that a grant of legislative institutions such as that made by the proclamation was irrevocable, but it established the proclamation as the legal constitution of Quebec until it was repealed, as far as related to the province, by the Quebec Act of 1774.³ Vital as Lord Mansfield's decision is in the history of colonial institutions, it came only after ten years of vigorous controversy over the legality of the proclamation, and at a moment when constitutional changes discounted its practical importance.

¹ See Quebec Revenue Acts (14 Geo. III, c. 88, and 15 Geo. III, c. 40), Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 136 ff., 149.

The long commission and instructions given to Murray did not entirely rectify these defects nor provide a clear scheme of government. Both are full of regulations to govern the future house of assembly and the future laws which it will pass. The assembly, however, was far off—'impracticable for the present'—and legislative authority was vested in the governor with the advice of his council. The grant was not very comprehensive, as they could make no law which should 'any ways tend to affect the life, limb or liberty of the subject, or to the imposing any duties or taxes'. The governor acting on similar advice could erect courts of justice, and could appoint judges and justices of the peace with the goodwill of the majority of his council. Nothing is said of the laws to be administered, but English precedents were implied in the instruction that in creating a judicial system consideration was to be given to what had been done in the other colonies, especially in Nova Scotia. In the public commission (which was published) no attempt was made to clear up the religious ambiguity. The private instructions throw light on the difficulty and will be considered later in another connexion.

¹ See Masères's memorandum as attorney-general of Quebec : Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 257 ff.

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 79 ff.

³ 14 Geo. III, c. 83, ibid., pp. 132 ff.

The criticism which has been made of the early scheme of government would be far from judicial, were it not for further considerations. The defects pointed out appear after the plan had been at work rather than at the moment of inception. On the surface, it must have seemed an easy enough thing to govern a people so far removed from any conception of free citizenship. The simplicity, however, was complicated by the fact that never before had Great Britain acquired half a continent, so to speak, in which another white race had made colonizing experiments. To govern a conquered white race was a problem of inexperience, and it was made all the more difficult because they must be ruled in close relationship to adjoining British colonists, alien in race and speech and religion, and without rivals in political thinking. There was plenty of room here for political, social, religious, or economic trouble. Were this survey complete, it would have presented an outlook difficult enough. Unfortunately there was also the ever-irritating and complex Indian problem, and to make matters more difficult still there were British settlers already in the province. It may be impossible to say that the documents were the product of studious care; but ambiguities and defects might well be expected when all the contemporary circumstances are taken into consideration.

With goodwill and courage and with affection towards the Canadians, Murray began his task. On September 17, 1764, he set up a system of civil courts.¹ A court of king's bench was instituted, presided over by the chief justice, in which criminal cases and the more important civil cases were heard agreeable to English law and to the ordinances issued under the governor's authority. In this court all subjects were admitted as jurors without distinction. Murray explained that he thought it 'unjust to exclude the new Roman catholic subjects . . . as such exclusion would constitute . . . two hundred protestants perpetual judges of the lives and property of not only eighty thousand of the new subjects, but likewise of all the military in the province'. A court of common pleas was also set up for the trial of lesser civil cases among French-Canadians only. Once again Murray excused his deviation from his instructions. A court for French-Canadians was necessary, and 'not to admit of such a court, until they can be supposed to know something of our laws and methods of procuring justice in our courts, would be like sending a ship to sea without a compass : indeed it would be more cruel, the ship might escape . . . but the poor Canadians could never shun the attempts of designing men and the voracity of hungry practitioners in the law. They must be undone during the first months of their ignorance ; if any escaped, their affections must be alienated and disgusted with our government and laws.'¹ These arrangements were doubtless the outcome of Murray's kindly disposition, which unfortunately for Murray ended in his own undoing in Canada. They illustrate, however, the indefiniteness and insecurity of administrative provisions, which culminated in the constitutional recognition of conciliation as a policy in Canadian development.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 37 ff.

[AUTHORITIES.—The most important documents are in A. Shortt and A. G. Doughty, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1759-1791 (Ottawa, 1918) ; W. P. M. Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759-1915 (Oxford, 1918) ; the State Papers, Q. 1, Q. 2, and the Letter Books and Papers of General Murray (Canadian Archives). Light is thrown on the circumstances surrounding the royal proclamation in C. W. Alvord, Genesis of the Proclamation of 1763 (Michigan Historical Society, 1908). The same author touches incidentally on the same subject in The Mississippi Valley in British Politics (2 vols., Cleveland, 1917), which also contains a long discussion, with a valuable bibliography, on the question of the retention of Canada in 1763. The standard life of Murray, based on a careful working of the available material, is R. H. Mahon, Life of General James Murray (London, 1921).]

¹ State Papers, Q. 62, A. 2, p. 500 (Canadian Archives).

CHAPTER VI

THE CIVIL GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC, 1764-74

As the new scheme of government took form, it is clear that at the beginning repression of the French-Canadians was part of the British policy. French law was apparently abolished by the royal proclamation. However strongly this may have been denied five years later by Hillsborough, president of the board of trade in 1763, there is no suggestion at the time that his interpretation was valid.¹ Quite apart from this denial, indications of a repressive policy are forthcoming. In relation to religion the evidence is clear. We have seen the guarded guarantee, repeated to Murray, of the peace of Paris. His commission and instructions throw light on the policy. The former² ordered him to accept as members of the future assembly only those who had subscribed to the statutory declaration against popery. In the latter³ he was commanded to give all possible encouragement to the erection of protestant schools, to the maintenance of protestant ministers, and to the provision of protestant schoolmasters, 'to the end that the church of England may be established both in principles and practice, and that the said inhabitants may by degrees be induced to embrace the protestant religion and their children be brought up in the principles of it'. He was to see that the inhabitants 'conform with great exactness to the stipulations of the treaty' in 'professing the worship of their religion'. The saving clause in the treaty rendered it ambiguous, and the governor's orders 'not to admit of any ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the see of Rome', if carried out, must have meant the disappearance of the religious organization inherently necessary to the worship of the Roman catholic church. There was also a remarkable omission. When the French commander had asked, at the capitulation of Montreal, that the Canadians 'be obliged by the English government to pay their priests the tithes . . . they were used to pay under the government of his most Christian majesty', he was told that the obligation would depend on the king of England's pleasure.¹ The tithe had been a source of clerical income since 1663 and had been regularly paid since 1667, under an order from the sovereign council.² During the 'régime militaire' neglect had set in. Murray's instructions did nothing to conciliate the clergy in this connexion. The already existing suspicion with regard to religion was thus increased, and the good faith of the treaty was further questioned.

¹ Hillsborough to Carleton, March 6, 1768, Kennedy, op. cit., p. 57.

² Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 175.

³ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 32 ff.

Did this evidence stand by itself it would be strong enough. It is supported by an official contemporary interpretation of the religious concession. Murray was informed, in the announcement of his appointment as governor, that the king suspected that the Canadians would use the liberty granted of professing their religion to hold on to the French connexion and to combine for the recovery of their country. The priests must be narrowly watched, and the slightest suspicion of interference by them in civil affairs must be punished by removal. The gift of the treaty was a mere toleration. When, during the peace negotiations, the French ministers proposed that after the grant of 'liberty of the Catholic religion' the words comme ci-devant should be inserted, they did not abandon the demand until they were told that such words would be a deception and that the laws of Great Britain must prevail.³ The idea may still survive

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., p. 10.

² 'Un Episode de l'histoire de la Dime au Canada,' par M. l'abbé A. Gosselin (Transactions of the Royal Society of Canada, 2nd series, vol. ix, sect. i, pp. 45 ff.).

³ Egremont to Murray, August 13, 1763, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit. pp. 168 ff.

that the phrase 'as far as the laws of Great Britain permit' was merely a legal tag, like 'the laws of King Edward' in the early Norman charters; but such valid contemporary comment proves the unreality of the idea.

Opposition to the policy was at once apparent. Lord Mansfield wrote to Bute's successor, George Grenville, against the whole tenor of the administrative proposals in the royal proclamation.¹ In Quebec the French-Canadians early petitioned against the probable withdrawal of concessions,² and Murray himself began a liberal rule with deviations from the letter of his orders and with protests against repression. In asking for religious privileges in Quebec, denied to Roman catholics at home, he was specially emphatic, promising that 'perhaps the bravest and the best race upon the globe' would thus 'become the most faithful and most useful set of men in this American empire'.³ He prayed that his retirement might be granted if 'the popish laws must be exerted with rigour' against the people whom he loved and admired.⁴ In the darkest days of his recall, he was content to defend his conduct by saying that 'he could not be prevailed upon to persecute his majesty's Roman catholic subjects in Canada', though he thus 'displeased the little protestant traders, who all—Quakers, Puritans, Anabaptists, Presbyterians, Atheists, Infidels, and even Jews—joined in protesting against any consideration being paid to the poor Canadians'.⁵ Murray's attitude in this period is not isolated. His successor, Carleton, saw in the suppression of French law an unparalleled severity, especially as he considered that Quebec, 'barring catastrophe shocking to think of', would always remain pre-

¹ Mansfield to Grenville, December 24, 1764, Grenville Papers, vol. ii, p. 476.

² Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 229.

³ Murray to the Lords of Trade, October 29, 1764, ibid., p. 231

⁴ Murray to Lord Eglinton, October 27, 1764, Letter Book of General Murray (Canadian Archives).

⁵ Draft answers to the Articles of Complaint, n. d., Murray Papers, bundle vii (Canadian Archives).

dominantly French.¹ His official dispatches are full of almost passionate pleading against a policy which abstract justice and local circumstances alike condemned.

The general fear and dissatisfaction resulted in a gradual mitigation of the letter of the law. Late in 1764, Murray was instructed that the royal proclamation should not be rigidly adhered to in taking away 'from the native inhabitants the benefit of their own laws and customs in cases where titles to land and modes of descent, alienation, and settlement are in question, nor to preclude them from that share in the administration of judicature which both in reason and justice they are entitled to, in common with the rest of our subjects'. Where life and liberties were concerned 'British laws and constitution' must prevail.² Within a few years French-Canadian jurors and French-Canadian lawyers were given a legal status, and the old land-laws were confirmed. In ecclesiastical affairs concessions were finally winked at. At first, when the chapter of Quebec elected M. de Montgolfier bishop the British government did not recognize the election, and it was annulled at Rome, and for a long time no formal permission could be obtained for an appointment. Through influence in London, Murray gradually forced the issue.³ Mgr. Briand was appointed bishop-designate, and after personal negotiations he was informed that the government would have no objection to his consecration and to his residence in Quebec, but would not recognize his title as bishop. Briand was quietly consecrated at Paris. He arrived at Quebec the day Murray sailed for England, and quickly assumed the full episcopal authority and style.⁴

In time the inherent difficulties of government might have

¹ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 284, 289.

² Dartmouth MSS., M. 383, 50 (Canadian Archives).

³ Cf. Cramahé to Murray, London, February 9, 1765, Murray Papers (Canadian Archives). Murray had opposed Montgolfier as a man 'too haughty and imperious': Doutre and Lareau, op. cit., p. 541.

⁴ See l'abbé A. Gosselin, L'Église du Canada après la Conquête, vol. i, 1760-75 (Quebec, 1916).

been surmounted, had it not been for the presence in the province of a few hundred British traders, on whom Murray lavished the wealth of a caustic pen. Grouping them with the adventurers who are the usual by-product of war and conquest, he characterized them as 'licentious fanatics', 'the most immoral collection of men I ever knew,' 'cruel, ignorant, rapacious fanatics', 'wild and mad'.¹ In more guarded language Carleton described them as, on the whole, fortune-hunters.² When all due allowances are made for the irritation which they caused to these two high-minded governors in a hard and trying situation, it is well to remember that there were among them men of honour and honesty who did not a little to lay the economic foundations of the province. In addition many of them had become settlers relying on the promise of British institutions and laws. When they saw the policy of conciliation taking form in actual administration, it was almost natural that they should proclaim that they had been grossly deceived. Among the best of them there was a strain of New England puritanism which carried with it no very happy memories either in tradition or experience of priest or prelate. Even had their political theory been somewhat modern, their religious affiliations would have prevented them from displaying any tolerant spirit. Almost at once they began to call for a house of assembly, and they soon became more persistent in their demands, as they watched with dismay sacrosanct British institutions and laws recede farther and farther from them down the full tide of concession and liberalism. For ten years they carried on an agitation that varied from sobriety and reason to tactlessness and folly, and included every line of attack. To follow its course in detail is here unnecessary, but their demands in relation to the constitution must be noted.

¹ Murray to the Lords of Trade, October 29, 1764, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 231; Murray to Burton, January 8, 1764; same to Eglington, October 27, 1764; The Letter Book of General Murray; same to Shelburne, August 20, 1766, Haldimand Papers, B. 8, p. 1.

² Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 284.

Two months after the establishment of civil government the grand jury of Quebec made their presentment an occasion for attack, and as a climax they claimed that 'as the grand jury must be considered at present as the only body representative of the colony, they, as British subjects, have a right to be consulted before any ordinance that may affect the body that they represent be passed into a law'.¹ Before long the merchants organized their opposition, and appointed an English barrister as their agent in London to safeguard their rights. This agent played no small part in Murray's recall. Charges of a personal nature were piled up. The governor was bitter in temper, rude in tongue, and flagrantly partial. His 'almost a total neglect of attendance upon the service of the church' was not even counted to him as judicious righteousness. These personal attacks only witnessed to their hatred of the man whom they considered the fountain-head of unconstitutional government. As a fitting conclusion to them, they once more demanded representative institutions, 'there being a number more than sufficient of loyal and well-affected protestants, exclusive of military officers, to form a competent and respectable house of assembly'; and the French-Canadians might be allowed, if the king thought fit, to vote for these protestant assembly men.² Modern views may look on the latter suggestion as conceited condescension. Perhaps it was not made without great travail of soul and dour searching of heart.

Murray was recalled in 1766,³ but his successor, Sir Guy Carleton, did not prove any more willing to find a via media for the minority. When some of them submitted a rough draft for a house of assembly and hoped that he would have no objection to their having it signed by supporters, he told them that he had many objections. To assemblies in the abstract he might agree, but he failed to see how a practical experiment could be made in Quebec. In writing to England, he maintained that the best Canadians considered representative houses as the breeding-place of refractory and insolent peoples, and that they did not wish to gain the royal displeasure, as the southern colonies had done through the misconduct of their legislatures. Carleton's mature opinion was that in a colony 'where all men appear nearly on a level', a popular assembly 'must give a strong bias to republican principles'.¹ The bluntness of the governor did not silence the disaffected. Petitions continued to rise in ascending scale through the governor, the house of commons, and secretary of state to the footsteps of the throne. These, however, do not afford much light on the situation. Once French-Canadians are claimed as being in favour of an assembly;² and when the grant seemed finally denied, a request was made that a legislative council should be appointed directly by the king and rendered quite independent of the governor.³ Social factors increased the discontent. The government circle looked down on the merchant class, not merely as traders but as democrats. The military also despised their so-called social inferiors.⁴ When a merchant named Thomas Walker lost his ear in a fracas distinguished 'by crêpe masks and blackened features', and the administration failed to bring his supposed military assailants to justice, the hatred grew deeper, as Walker's fellow tradesmen believed that the government had taken the soldiers under the shelter of their authority. The

¹ Presentment of the Grand Jury of Quebec, October 16, 1764, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 212 ff.

² Ibid., pp. 232 ff.

³ Murray was recalled to England April 1, 1766. On the 7th Carleton was appointed lieutenant-governor. He acted under Murray's official instructions till he was appointed governor-in-chief in 1768, when he received a new set for himself.

¹ Carleton to Shelburne, January 20, 1768, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 294 ff.

² Ibid., p. 490.

³ Ibid., p. 520; and cf. p. 487.

⁴ Murray to the Lords of Trade, March 3, 1764, State Papers, Q. 2, p. 377 (Canadian Archives).

economic, social, and military life of the province combined to give the political issues an ugly and dangerous appearance.

The attention of the British government was early drawn to the state of affairs ; and, with the origins of the Quebec Act of 1774 in view, it is necessary to summarize the considerations given to the constitutional problem during these years. In 1765, in answer to a request for an opinion, the law officers of the crown reported that Roman catholics in Canada were not under the disabilities created by the penal laws.¹ A few months later the board of trade recommended a house of assembly elected by all the inhabitants, Roman catholic and protestant.² In the following year the law officers advised a mixed system of French and English law.³ All these opinions, however, were English opinions, and the privy council decided to consult definitely the governor, chief justice, and attorney-general of Quebec.⁴ The reports from Canada did not reach London till 1770. Carleton left the work of drawing up a joint report to Francis Masères, the attorney-general, who drew up a long draft in which he examined the advantages and disadvantages of several methods of dealing with the legal system.⁵ The draft was not at all acceptable to Carleton, who had already made up his mind. He sent in his own report recommending the laws of England with respect to criminal matters, and the revival of the whole body of French civil law which was in use before the conquest.⁶ The chief justice and attorney-general thereupon sent independent reports in which they reported against Carleton and the whole French civil code, and advised a blend of English and French civil law.⁷ Meanwhile, the board of trade had again reopened the matter and presented on July 10, 1769, another

¹ The Attorney-General and Solicitor-General to the Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, June 10, 1765, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 236.

² Board of Trade to the King, September 2, 1765, ibid., pp. 247 ff.

³ Report of Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, April 14, 1766, ibid., pp. 251 ff.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 285 ff.

⁵ Ibid., pp. 327 ff.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 369 ff.

⁷ Ibid., pp. 370 ff.

report far in advance of any previous opinion, in which they recommended the creation of a house of assembly with French-Canadian members for the rural constituencies.¹ This report was sent to Carleton under orders of the closest secrecy.

It might appear that the ground was now pretty well covered and that the time for action had come. It is hard, however, to believe that the ministry was serious in all its promises of a speedy quietus to the uncertainties and doubts and fears. The endless tangle was once again pulled to pieces by the solicitor-general, the attorney-general, and the advocate-general,² the two former leaning to Carleton, the latter to Masères, both of whom had returned to England and were making themselves felt. In Canada Cramahé carried on the government, where the British continued to agitate and added to their old methods 'American ideas in regard to taxation', secretly urging that the British tyranny against the 'southern colonies could only be averted from Quebec by a house of assembly.'³ Memorials from the French-Canadians reached England early in 1774, which anticipated with too suspicious accuracy the final decisions of the Quebec Act—no assembly, a council, extended boundaries, French civil law. Masères claimed that these petitions actually became the foundations of the Act.⁴ It may be that they were inspired from sources which Masères's Huguenot honesty least suspected.

Almost a veil of secrecy falls over the developments which culminated in the Quebec Act of 1774. It may never be possible to reconstruct the history as the new constitution passed through many drafts to its final shape. Carleton undoubtedly stands behind the scenes, which assume a strange interest when we remember that the Act was born amid the rumbling thunders of the coming American revolution. The

¹ Ibid., pp. 377 ff.

² Ibid., pp. 424 ff.

³ Cramahé to Dartmouth, July 15, 1774, ibid., pp. 503 ff.

⁴ Ibid., p. 504, note 2.

first great colonial empire, grown to manhood, was shaking its strong locks and stretching its fierce limbs to put to test newer principles, at a moment when the youngest child of empire—wearied with political, religious, and racial struggle—was waiting in almost hushed melancholy the fiat of its foster-mother. Fears and hopes centred round Carleton. His dispatches during these years have not been studied here, as they fit more naturally into a discussion of the origins of the Act; but he was at once the most loved and the most hated man, the hero and the villain of the piece.

In attempting to form a critical estimate of this period, the most striking point is the constitutional uncertainty. The governor did not know his powers; the merchants did not know if they had been deceived; the noblesse did not know their rights; the Roman catholic church did not know its status; the habitants were encircled in a gloom of apathetic doubt. As for the judicial system, it was an almost inexplicable tangle. To determine at any given moment the exact body of laws in force would have tantalized the most penetrating jurist. Even the organization of the council was in debate. In the actual affairs of everyday life there was no efficiency. There were many honourable and blameless officials, but there were also many ill trained in law and affairs and ignorant of French. They added greed and cunning to their incompetency. Anxious hours were spent over institutions when men were needed. The early local justices appointed after 1764 proved so tyrannical and useless that Carleton tried to curtail their powers.¹ A system of fees prevailed which encouraged litigation and discounted equity. So chaotic was the state of affairs that the French-Canadians looked back with regret to the 'excess of kindness' during the 'régime militaire'.²

The self-evident desire of Great Britain to treat the province as one of the colonies was also a source of weakness. The very liberties so dear to eighteenth-century Englishmen, and promised with such lavish profusion, were strangely unsuited to a Roman catholic people, heirs to the apathy born of paternalism and still children in political development. To recast the people of New France was too great a task ; to make them potential co-heirs with their British fellow citizens to institutions, laws, and systems which they did not understand was to court confusion ; to attempt assimilation was to accentuate differences. The royal proclamation, though practically futile, hung over the heads of the French-Canadians, a political sword of Damocles. To the British in the colony it represented a broken treaty, a scrap of paper, an ideal to strive for, a promise to be fulfilled. Even the good intentions of men like Murray and Carleton only paved the via dolorosa to a constitutional calvary. When at last courage was stiffened by other circumstances, it was little wonder that the Quebec Act was grimly entitled ' An Act for making more effectual provision for the government of the Province of Quebec in North America '.

¹ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 401 ff.

² Ibid., p. 507.

[AUTHORITIES.—The important documents are in A. Shortt and A. G. Doughty, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1759-1791 (Ottawa, 1918) ; W. P. M. Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759-1915 (Oxford, 1918) ; Egerton and Grant, Canadian Constitutional Development (Toronto, 1907) ; The State Papers, Q. 2-Q. 10 (Canadian Archives) ; The Letter Books of General Murray, and The Murray Papers (Canadian Archives) ; The Dartmouth Papers (Canadian Archives). The publications of Masères are important, especially A Collection of Several Commissions . . . relating to the state of the Province of Quebec (London, 1772) ; An Account of the Proceedings . . . to obtain a House of Assembly (London, 1775) ; Additional Papers concerning the Province of Quebec (London, 1776). W. S. Wallace, The Masères Letters (Toronto, 1919), contains valuable material. T. Chapais, ' Notre Question religieuse en 1764 ' in Le Parler Français, December 1917, pp. 145 ff., is suggestive and valuable.]

CHAPTER VII

THE QUEBEC ACT, 1774

THE serious consideration of a new constitution for Quebec appears to have been begun during the closing months of 1773. Voluminous as the early reports were which have just been considered, prolific as the promises had been since 1766 that the government of the province would soon be settled, there is reason to believe that the mass of material was not critically digested till within a few months of the introduction of the Quebec Act. It was not entirely irresponsible opposition which made Townshend twit Lord North on a delay that had issued in anarchy and confusion.¹ However, when the subject was actually taken up, there was plenty of legal opinion, and much correspondence and consultation between the ministry, Carleton, Masères, Chief Justice Hey, and William Knox, under-secretary of state for the colonies, a man of considerable experience in English and American affairs. The bill passed through many hands and appeared in many forms before it was introduced on May 2, 1774, in the house of lords.² Only a few members of either house thought it worth their while to remain in London to take part in or to listen to the discussions, and the bill received the royal assent on June 22. During its progress through the house of commons important debates took place which will be considered later in connexion with the origin of the Act. For the moment it is only necessary to remark that Carleton's ideas largely prevailed in the new instrument of government.

¹ J. Wright, Cavendish's Debates . . . on the Bill for making more effectual provision for the Government of the Province of Quebec (London, 1839), pp. i ff. These debates are partially in Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 86 ff., and in Egerton and Grant, op. cit., pp. 23 ff.

² See the various drafts in Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 535 ff.

If the Quebec Act of 1774¹ is considered merely in its enactments and apart from everything else, generosity is written large over it. The Act might almost be summed up in the words of Burke: 'with regard to state policy . . . the preservation of their old prejudices, their old customs by the bill, turns the balance in favour of France. The only difference is, they will have George the third for Louis the sixteenth.'² The proclamation of 1763 as far as it applied to Quebec was revoked. A house of assembly was deemed inexpedient, and a nominated council was set up to assist the governor in legislation and in administration. A modified oath rendered it possible for Roman catholics to be admitted. The whole body of French civil law was revived. The Roman catholic church was given a legal status by the provision that tithes could be collected from its members by due process. This provision and the new oath seriously modified the Elizabethan Act of supremacy which guarded the religious grant. The regulations for taxation supplementary to the Act were embodied in a statute of the following year and only imposed duties analogous to those under the French régime.³ Explicit conciliation may not have been intended, but the duties were less obnoxious to the French-Canadian than to the British element, who had already begun to disseminate ideas in the matter of taxation similar to those which had gained force in the Thirteen Colonies, and were threatening disintegration.⁴ Under the proclamation of 1763 there was evidently an intention of creating a government for the trading country of the west, which, as a matter of fact, remained for ten years without any formal administration. Labrador, Anticosti, and the Magdalen Islands had been included under the government of Newfoundland. The fishing and fur-trading interests in Quebec protested against this arrangement, and economically

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 132 ff. (14 Geo. III, c. 83).

² Cavendish, op. cit., p. 289.

³ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 136 ff. (14 Geo. III, c. 88).

⁴ See above, p. 47.

much might be said in favour of a reconstruction of the boundaries. In spite of opposition from the secretary of state for the colonies, the Quebec Act reannexed Labrador to the province, and extended the boundaries to include not only modern Ontario but the limitless country indefinitely bounded by the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and by the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company.¹ There is concession here, for the intention, as will appear later, was to preserve the western hinterland as a vast French and Indian reserve to the exclusion of other settlers.

The machinery of government set up by the Quebec Act and amplified by instructions to the governor² was practically that of 1763. An assembly was shelved with no promises for the future. The council was increased from twelve members to not more than twenty-three and not less than seventeen, a new oath widening the choice of members. The only organic change was made in differentiating the executive and legislative functions of the council. Carleton was instructed 'that any five of the said council shall constitute a board of council for transacting all business in which their advice and consent may be requisite, acts of legislation only excepted'. He interpreted this order as justifying him in creating a kind of inner circle or 'privy council' as he called it, to whom he entrusted all administrative work to the exclusion of the other members.¹ The chief justice, Peter Livius, challenged the arrangement and protested that the instruction was permissive, and that every member had a right to a summons whenever the council sat. A snub and dismissal were the governor's answer to the strict legalist.² Livius appealed to the British government, which decided in 1779 in his favour.³ The decision forced the hand of Carleton's successor, Haldimand, who had continued the practice. In spite of the fact that he had been ordered to desist,⁴ he raised the question 'whether every measure of government ought to be exposed and laid open to the mixture of people which compose our council'.⁵ His purity of intention did not prevent him from receiving a severe rebuke and further peremptory orders.⁶ The executive or privy council disappeared from history. In fact the distinction between the executive and legislative functions of the council remained, for while only five members were necessary for executive business, the presence of half the members was necessary for legislation. The legislative powers,

¹ 'All the territories, islands, and countries in North America, belonging to the crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the Highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees of north latitude on the eastern bank of the river Connecticut, keeping the same latitude directly west through the Lake Champlain, until in the same latitude it meets the river St. Lawrence; from thence up the eastern bank of the said river to the Lake Ontario; thence through the Lake Ontario and the river commonly called Niagara; and thence along by the eastern and south eastern bank of Lake Erie, following the said bank until the same shall be intersected by the northern boundary granted by the charter of the province of Pennsylvania, in case the same shall be so intersected; and from thence along the said northern and western boundaries of the said province until the said western boundary shall strike the Ohio: But in case the said bank of the said lake shall not be found to be so intersected, then following the said bank until it shall arrive at that point of the said bank which shall be nearest to the north-western angle of the said province of Pennsylvania, and thence, by a right line, to the said north-western angle of the said province; and thence along the western boundary of the said province, until it strike the river Ohio; and along the bank of the said river westward to the banks of the river Mississippi and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay; and also all such territories, islands, and countries which have, since the tenth of February 1763 been made part of the government of Newfoundland—be . . . annexed to and made part and parcel of the province of Quebec as created and established by the . . . Royal Proclamation of the 7th October 1763.' For an interesting discussion of the western boundaries, see D. Mills, A Report on the Boundaries of Ontario, pp. 1 ff. (Toronto, 1873).

² Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 594 ff.

¹ Ibid., p. 702.

² For the history and documents of this and other disputes see William Smith, 'The Struggle over the Laws of Canada, 1763-1783' (Canadian Historical Review, vol. i, pp. 167 ff.).

³ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 698 ff.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 704 ff.

⁵ Haldimand to Germain, September 14, 1779, State Papers, Q. 16. 2, p. 591 (Canadian Archives).

⁶ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 724.

however, were not wide. It could issue no ordinance touching religion, and could inflict no greater punishment than fine or imprisonment for three months. In taxation its authority was limited to levying taxes for public roads or buildings—‘gathering stones from one place, and piling them up in another’, as the southern colonists described the ‘insulting’ limitation.¹

The provisions relating to the law need careful attention. British criminal law and French civil law were imposed on the province—Carleton’s suggestion of 1769²—the latter being substantially the Coutume de Paris, modified by the edicts and amendments of the governors and intendants of New France and amplified by French legal authorities.³ Its provisions governed not merely land tenure, marriage, inheritance, and dower, but trade and commerce. Thus the prosperous business interests of the colony, largely in British hands, passed under a French code. The Act provided that ‘in all matters of controversy, relative to property and civil rights, resort shall be had to the laws of Canada . . . and all causes that shall be hereafter instituted . . . shall, with respect to such property and rights, be determined agreeably to the said laws and customs of Canada, until they shall be varied or altered by any ordinances that shall, from time to time, be passed by the governor . . . by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council’. The criminal law of England was to govern criminal cases, until amended by the governor and council. Lord North in defending the civil and criminal codes said that they were merely a general basis,⁴ and that the local machinery of government could change them to suit the province; and Carleton, in his examination at the bar of the house, stated that he considered there

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., p. 141.

² See above, p. 46.

³ The Coutume de Paris was the French civil law codified in 1510. It had been introduced by royal arrêt into New France in 1664. See W. B. Munro, ‘The Custom of Paris in the New World’ (Sonderabdruck aus Juristische Festgabe des Auslandes zu Josef Kohler’s 60. Geburtstag, pp. 132 ff.). Stuttgart: F. Enke.

⁴ Cavendish, op. cit., p. 11.

would be no objections by the French-Canadians to alterations in respect to trade and commerce, provided the changes were explained.¹ In Carleton's instructions there is a distinct and more explicit continuation of the enactment and of North's comment on it. The governor and council were asked to consider whether 'the laws of England may not be, if not altogether, at least in part the rule for the decision in all cases of personal actions grounded upon debts, promises, contracts and agreements whether of a mercantile or other nature; and also of wrongs proper to be compensated in damages; and more especially where our natural-born subjects of Great Britain, Ireland, or our other Plantations residing at Quebec, or who may resort thither, or have credits or property within the same, may happen to be either plaintiff or defendant in any civil suit of such a nature'. The instructions went farther. The writ of habeas corpus, so vigorously contended for and so vigorously opposed at the passing of the Quebec Act, was recommended for adoption to the legislature of the province.²

It is obvious that there was created a loophole for the British in the colony. That there was not substantial legislation on their behalf is true, but the debates and royal instructions are not obscure and prove that the general principle laid down in the constitution was capable of modification on the spot. The scheme was this: an assembly could not be granted; English criminal law was a good foundation; French civil law was just, considering the local conditions; changes could be made by the governor and council of the province—the system was not rigid. So clear was the purpose that Carleton was ordered to communicate to his council at once such of his instructions as required their advice and consent.³

Carleton's course is confusing. He did not immediately publish the full Act, but merely inserted in the Gazette an abstract which left the impression, so dear to popular histories, that the laws were English criminal law and French civil law, with no elasticity or avenue for change. He busied himself in reporting to England the gratitude of the 'new subjects' and the suspicious proceedings of the traders.¹ The colonial secretary assured him of the king's goodwill to the disaffected, who would doubtless be reconciled when they heard and understood the complete plan.² When at length he published the full Act, he made no effort to explain its implications. When military exigencies allowed the council to meet for the first time in August 1775, he did not disclose a line of his instructions as ordered. The council was also left in blissful ignorance of the fact that the governor had in his possession a draft ordinance which had been approved by the British government. This would have satisfied the merchants and would have aroused no popular disapproval, as it permitted facts to be decided by juries, or if both parties preferred by the judges.³ When the American revolution again allowed a council to be called in 1777, juries were ruled out, and the English law of evidence allowed. Livius broke another lance with the governor over the concealed instructions, but Carleton remained obdurate, for he knew that he had his council well in hand. The whole question was reopened under Haldimand, who was reprimanded by the British government for following Carleton's proceedings and ordered to communicate the necessary instructions, which he did in August 1781. The date is significant. The policy was too late. The army of Cornwallis was marching to its fate at Yorktown, with the old English tune of the surrender, 'The world turned upside down', already haunting the October air. The importance of the episode may not appear at the moment, but when it is linked up later with a consideration of the Quebec Act as a whole, it will assume a distinct place in the historical interpretation.

¹ Ibid., pp. 106 ff.

² Kennedy, op. cit., p. 152.

³ Ibid., p. 150.

¹ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 586 ff.

² Ibid., pp. 585 ff.

³ Ibid., pp. 637 ff.

The provisions granted in the Act to the Roman catholic church are remarkable, when the legal disabilities in England are recalled. Although the church of England became the official church of the colony under very direct governmental control, the Roman catholic church was placed on an almost equal footing. The freedom of worship promised by the peace of Paris was once more granted. The condition attached was no longer vague, for the saving clause guarding the king's ecclesiastical supremacy disappeared in the legalizing of the clerical rights and dues, and in an oath which modified the Elizabethan model. It is true that the royal instructions to Carleton ordered that the Roman catholic bishop and priests should exercise their offices only under licence from the governor, and that he should remember that only toleration was granted and not 'the powers and privileges of an established church'. All appeals to the Vatican were prohibited, but this regulation was neglected from the beginning. There was no religious hatred for many a day to come, and Roman catholics and protestants shared the parish churches for their respective services. With this background it is now possible to discuss the origins and wisdom of the Act.

Looking at the history superficially, it would seem that there had been much anxiety over the government of Canada from the earliest days following the peace of Paris down to the Quebec Act itself. The state papers and dispatches are many, the official reports on conditions and possibilities are numerous. The question appears to have been considered from varied angles by varied minds. A priori there were reasons for a new constitution. The old one had been a dead letter, and had never been carried out. It was a bone of contention, a legal stumbling-block, a fly in the administrative ointment. It thus seems possible to say that the Quebec Act was a reasoned culmination to a series of carefully matured discussions, and that it represented a generous working foundation for a very much needed new government. The debates largely bear out this conception. Lord North emphasized again and again that the scheme was the only one possible under the circumstances. The attorney-general execrated the idea of imposing on the conquered the complete institutions of the conquerors, as such an act would involve misery and slavery. The happiness of the Canadians was at stake. Barbarity and tyranny alone could descend to the theft of customs, religion, and laws. It certainly looks like a remarkable miracle to find men traditionally tory and reactionary handing out to a conquered people, of a race historically hostile to Great Britain and of a religion condemned by bell, book, and candle in scores of British statutes, such a charter of liberties at the close of the eighteenth century. It may be granted that the Act was generous, even miraculous. The student of history, however, must ask if the generosity was logical and spontaneous, if the suspension of the laws of party politics arose from an overwhelming conviction that Canadian conditions were such that the government bill appeared the only solution. The Quebec Act requires more than an emotional surrender even to a political miracle. There are other points of view which must be considered in attempting a balanced judgement.

We know that the reports were practically pigeon-holed for years and were only considered in relation to practical politics late in 1773. We know when the Act assumed its final form, almost every legal and expert opinion was rejected, and Carleton's ideas were almost completely incorporated. It is necessary to trace the causes behind these facts. Carleton undoubtedly, with Murray and Cramahé, was always well disposed to the French-Canadians. He, with his brother governors and administrators, looked on their conquest as a mere accident in a wider and more complicated issue than colonial jealousies. Through no fault of their own they were treated as pawns on the chessboard of European diplomacy. Carleton, however, was a practical soldier, and he had no training in political thinking. There is no need to discount his soldierly and gentlemanly kindness to the conquered, in making a study of his relations to the problem of government which was forced upon him. He was too matter of fact in action to be misled wilfully by sentiment. All along he appears to have had definite opinions on the Canadian situation, which time and experience developed along their initial lines. As early as 1767 he had begun to relate Canada to the world, and to see the strategical position which the province would hold should the southern colonists prove recalcitrant.¹ The defences of the country and the guarding of communications with New York assumed serious proportions in his mind, and already he heard thousands of troops march at the beginning of a colonial war. While Carleton had his mind fixed on what appeared to him the only vital issue as far as Quebec was concerned, he was informed that the cabinet was seeking light on a new parliamentary constitution for the province, especially in connexion with the blending of laws to satisfy all the inhabitants.² His official report has been considered and was probably tied up in red tape with its fellows. His correspondence, however, was not overlooked. Here we find that official report amplified and explained. To a mind full of a military situation the cabinet brought a political problem, and in all the dispatches that follow, that problem is seen through the eyes of a soldier, who anticipated a war in which he and the province over which he presided would play perhaps a decisive part.

Believing that the request for light was firmly based on the idea of retaining Canada, he proceeded to show how he would guard that wish. Canada must be fortified, and the military establishment placed on a war footing. He attached much importance to the possibility of a French-Canadian army; at any rate the noblesse must be held, owing to their influence over the common people. The British element were unstable and fluctuating, and the province would remain predominantly French. If proper preparations were not made for war, a French alliance against England might make British rule precarious.¹ A little later, he again wrote home what is confessedly a continuation of his previous dispatch.² He blamed the entire constitutional scheme of 1763, and he outlined a political background for his military policy. There was no consideration 'of all the inhabitants' in it. The old scheme was an unparalleled severity by a conqueror, and the only just way out of the disgrace was to repeal every regulation and to restore 'Canadian laws almost entire'. A month later he harped back to his two previous dispatches.³ If the military proposals were carried out, he believed he could hold the province; but the interests of Great Britain would only be half advanced 'unless the Canadians are inspired with a cordial attachment and zeal for the king's government', and this attachment would come through concessions. Regiments of Canadian foot would materially help. Offices and councillorships must be opened to the French-Canadians, who, however, did not desire assemblies and their factious offspring. The dispatches were not unread. The secretary of state for the colonies informed Carleton that the king approved of 'his every sentiment'—military plans, French law, and administrative places for the Canadians—and desired him 'to prevail upon them to suffer patiently those delays which are unavoidable' in making changes at such a distance.⁴ A summary of the French laws accompanied Carleton's next communication,⁵ and his ideas began to gain wider

¹ Carleton to Gage, February 15, 1767, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 280.

² Shelburne to Carleton, June 20, 1767, ibid., p. 281.

¹ Carleton to Shelburne, November 25, 1767, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 282 ff.

² Same to same, December 24, 1767, ibid., pp. 288 ff.

³ Same to same, January 20, 1768, ibid., pp. 294 ff.

⁴ Hillsborough to Carleton, March 6, 1768, ibid., pp. 297 ff.

⁵ Carleton to Shelburne, April 12, 1768, ibid., pp. 299 ff.

adherence. He was promised that in the drawing up of a new constitution toleration for the Roman catholic church would be given serious attention ; meanwhile the ' new subjects ' must receive from the governor the necessary protection in the exercise of their religion.¹ Nor need he worry over the future ; parliament had passed a resolution ' to preserve inviolate the supreme authority of the legislature of Great Britain over all parts of the British Empire '.² On his side, Carleton felt sure that the Canadians would not intrigue with France. Fears, however, troubled him.³ France might throw in her lot with the colonies ' in their independent notions ', and the fate of America might be determined in Canada. Many of the seigniors desired to serve in the army. In the past ' we have done nothing to gain one man in the province '. The Canadians must be attached by being admitted to offices of trust. Once again approval followed. The necessity of giving the Canadians reasonable share in the new government would not be overlooked ; faction and prejudice, however, might hinder their employment in military service.⁴ Almost at once Carleton proposed the immediate inclusion of some twelve Canadian seigniors in the council ; but so anxious had he become over the situation that he desired leave of absence to discuss the whole matter personally with the government.⁵ A year and a half elapsed before he was able to leave Canada, and the correspondence continued in the old strain. Carleton urged conciliation and fortifications ; the ministry promised concessions and approval⁶ and desired him to remain in Canada

¹ Hillsborough to Carleton, October 12, 1768, ibid., pp. 325 ff.

² Same to same, November 15, 1768, State Papers, Q. 5. 2, p. 839 (Canadian Archives).

³ Carleton to Hillsborough, November 20, 1768, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 326 ff.

⁴ Hillsborough to Carleton, January 4, 1769, State Papers, Q. 6, p. 3 (Canadian Archives).

⁵ Carleton to Hillsborough, March 15, 1769, ibid., p. 34.

⁶ Same to same, May 9, 1769, ibid., p. 63 ; Hillsborough to Carleton, May 13, 1769, ibid., p. 12.

until the privy council had matured some plan.¹ When leave was at length granted, he was assured that nothing would be done until the Canadian point of view had been considered with his presence and assistance.² Carleton was in England over three years before real purpose of action was manifested by the government, and it may well be asked why the ministry at length took the matter up in earnest late in 1773. It is not unreasonable to suppose that Carleton, who all along had built up a political structure for Canada on a military foundation, was driving home to them the significance of the Virginia Resolves, Townshend's 'preamble', the Boston Massacre and Tea Party, and the Committees of Correspondence. He had become obsessed with 'the colonial disturbances', and the development in political thinking which his civil experience had brought to him was coloured by them.

It is impossible then to isolate the Quebec Act, unless the history of the North American continent from 1766 to 1774 is to be considered as consisting of water-tight compartments. Carleton's dispatches, his policy, and its manifest influence on the Act were all part of a larger problem. Nor do they stand isolated. The complete motives behind the extension of the boundaries are obscure; but, in addition to economic pressure from Quebec, American affairs figure in them beyond a doubt. In the draft stages, Hillsborough objected to any legislation on the boundaries as tending to make the westward country Roman catholic and French, and objectionable to the British.³ During the debates the challenge was frequently thrown out and as strongly denied that the object was to encircle the Thirteen Colonies.⁴ William Knox, the under-secretary for the colonies, maintained that the object was to preserve 'the whole of the derelict country . . . under the jurisdiction of Quebec . . .

¹ Hillsborough to Carleton, July 15, 1769, State Papers, Q. 6, p. 67.

² Same to same, December 1, 1769, ibid., p. 127.

³ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 551 ff.

⁴ See, for example, Cavendish, op. cit., pp. 17, 26, 42, 58, 73, 189, 196, 242.

with the avowed purpose of excluding all further settlement therein'.¹ It is possible to say, with Barré, that there was in the boundaries 'something that squints and looks dangerous to the inhabitants of the other colonies', and to share Burke's fears of 'a line of circumvallation' and the establishment of a 'siege of arbitrary power'.²

The evidence for the relation of the Quebec Act to the American revolution can be further strengthened. Lord North declared that the Act was brought in because 'His Majesty's message recommended parliament to take up the subject'. When the king's message of March 7, 1774, is examined, we find that he called upon the house of commons 'to enable him effectually to take such measures as might be most likely to put an immediate stop to the present disorders in North America, and also to take into their most serious consideration what regulations and permanent provisions might be necessary to be established for better securing the just dependence of the colonies on the crown and parliament of Great Britain'. The prime minister deliberately associated the Quebec Act with the four other 'intolerable acts' passed against 'the present disorders'. The invitation which the first Continental Congress sent to the inhabitants of Quebec can be laughed at with its appeal to forget differences of religion and to join the cause of liberty against the new inquisition.³ War propaganda makes poor historical material; but it is impossible lightly to dismiss the reference to the Quebec Act in the 'Address to the People of Great Britain' from the same congress. William Knox loyally supported the government as long as he was in office, and wrote, as we have seen, a defence of the Act; but he secretly agreed with Carleton that the new constitution was a necessary piece of legislation owing to the coming storm. In later life, however, when passions were hushed, he opened the door to the secret chamber of British policy.¹ To Chatham, who had expressed a fear in the house of lords that the bill would 'finally lose the hearts of all his majesty's American subjects',² a pamphlet was addressed by a writer well acquainted with the government's policy, in which honesty is more evident than party shrewdness. The policy was stated boldly: 'But there is another consideration which makes the affection of the Canadians still more desirable—I should be afraid to mention it if your lordship had not proclaimed it already—it is the present state of Boston. Should, my lord, (which God avert) a fatal necessity arise (as your lordship has has [sic] been too apt both to prognosticate and to advise) to coerce America, do you wish, in that melancholy event, to combine the heart of the Canadian with the heart of the Bostonian? Was Canada now in the possession of France, and should the Bostonian resolve upon rebellion, there can be no doubt whither he would look for support and for encouragement. But the loss of that hope may happily dispose him to better thoughts.'³

¹ William Knox, The Justice and Policy of the late Act of Parliament for making more effectual provision for the Government of Quebec asserted and proved, and the Conduct of the Administration respecting that Province stated and vindicated, p. 20 (London, 1774) (Canadian Archives).

² See an interesting pamphlet by Thomas Bernard, An Appeal to the Public; Stating and considering the Objections to the Quebec Act, pp. 51 ff. (London, 1774) (Canadian Archives). Bernard is very explicit in his view of the motives governing the boundaries.

³ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 139 ff.

The purpose of the Act thus takes on another aspect than that of generosity and goodwill, largely though these undoubtedly figured in it. North and his advisers make it plain that the colonists were not quite undeceived in including it among the oppressive acts, and Knox discloses the whole spirit of the scheme. Canada was to be a military base, held quiet by an endowed church, a vast hinterland, a satisfied noblesse, a recognized priesthood, French civil law, and a disciplined and obedient population. The policy of Governor Carleton became the policy of the British cabinet. We can now understand why Carleton hid his instructions during the crucial days in Canada. He intended that no concessions should be made to the British, for fear especially of offending the seigniors on whom his reliance was placed.

¹ William Knox, Extra Official State Papers, addressed to the Right Hon. Lord Rawdon, &c. (London, 1789) (Canadian Archives). Knox's pamphlet throws important light on colonial policy in general and on the boundaries in particular (see pp. 43 ff.).

² Chatham Correspondence, vol. iv, pp. 351 ff.

³ A Letter from Thomas Lord Lyttelton to William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, on the Quebec Bill, p. 19 (New York, reprinted 1774). This pamphlet was attributed to Lord Lyttelton by the colonists. It was published at first anonymously in London. Its real author was Sir William Meredith, a privy councillor, who was fully acquainted with the imperial policy.

The debates on the Act do not ring entirely true. Of the motives, origin, and objects of the bill, the ministry had no adequate explanations. Every single report on the state of Quebec by the experts and law officers was refused to the house of commons, and on two occasions specific votes for them were negatived.¹ That the government intended to make Canada a French province is the one thing clear. The motive, however, has been misinterpreted. In the light of the evidence available it is at present reasonable to conclude that the main idea seems to have been the continuation under another crown of the old French threat against the southern colonies. The loopholes in the Act in favour of the British settlers do not cut across this policy. It was possible to say that the best had been done in a complicated issue, that the vast majority had been considered; but if the future changed the conditions, there was an escape for the minority. It was quite the correct thing for the king to assent to the Act as 'founded on the clearest principles of justice and humanity'. But Carleton knew that in all probability he would return to Canada as civil governor and would control the situation. He had no disposition to disclose or to attempt concessions to the British. Even when he was most suspicious, most afraid, most contemptuous of their attitude, he did not do his plain duty and carry out his plain orders. The conditions changed quickly, and the ministry intended that in those changed conditions the permissive clauses of the Act should be fully known. They were glad to catch at the straws of support when Carleton's instructions were issued in January 1775. Carleton did not move. An elementary political insight would have shown him that it would have been at least good policy, and would have immensely strengthened his own hand, had he let the British element know that there was a legal opening at least for hope. He would thus have minimized their reasons for becoming spies and traitors. Carleton preferred to be governed by his idée fixe: if the French-Canadians are with us, who can be against us? A seignior and a priest in the hand are at present worth a few contemptible British traders in the bush. There is no necessity to deny the generosity of the measure. It is generous actually and potentially. The motives are in question. And no motives other than ulterior will serve entirely to explain why a government headed by Lord North and the servants of a 'patriot king' handed out 'justice and humanity' to the French-Canadians, and laws 'founded on the sentiments and inclinations of those who are to be governed by them',¹ while at the same time and in the same parliament they were goading their own flesh and blood into the shambles of civil war.

¹ See Cavendish, op. cit., pp. 94 ff.

The wisdom of the policy embodied in the Quebec Act can be studied from immediate and remote points of view. Its relation to the American revolution is evident and will become clearer. The Act did not pass unchallenged in England. Chatham thundered against it with eloquent pathos. Burke and Fox, the most advanced liberals of their day, could not rid their minds of the idea that the whole thing was policy; they felt that it had not been discussed on its merits, and that there lay behind unexplained reasons. The merchants enlisted the services of Masères, who amplified the petitions from Quebec with numerous pamphlets. The corporation of the city of London petitioned the king against the breach of political faith and the endowment of Roman catholicism. They laid their protest before him personally on his way to assent to the measure.¹ In 1775 a motion was made in the house of lords to repeal the Act, and its defence fell on Lord Lyttelton, a member of the government, who employed the words of the most enlightened liberalism, while at the same time he congratulated the country that already the policy was bearing fruit. In spite of the 'non-importation agreement', in spite of 'the factious resolutions of the assemblies, notwithstanding the inflexible enmity of the congress, the Canadians have opened a way for the English trader . . . these, my lords, are the consequences you have derived from this Canada bill'.²

¹ Lord Lyttelton (?), op. cit., p. 12.

A priori the Act appeared unwise. In reversing the policy of 1763, it was a distinct breach of faith. Many had come to the province relying on the promises given in the royal proclamation. Their hopes were disappointed, and it is hardly surprising to find that not a few of them cursed British perfidy and joined the rebels' cause. In addition, it is doubtful if the Act carried with it the goodwill of the Canadians as a whole. To the clergy, seigniors, and lawyers it was a carta libertatum—a grant of privileges—but to the habitants it was not so entirely acceptable. During the ten years of chaos before the passing of the Act they had become more independent, and not unfrequently the old ecclesiastical and feudal dues and rights remained unpaid. The idea of their being reimposed did not carry with it universal approval. Carleton soon found out that a process of disintegration had set in, of which his military mind had taken no account. When the seigniors and clergy called on the people to arm against the rebels and traitors of the south, there was little response. There are few more pathetic things in Canadian history than Carleton's dispatches during this period. Before long he was convinced that neither noblesse nor priesthood could rally the habitants in defence of their country. Southern propaganda flourished in the rich soil of ignorance and suspicion. He feared to assemble any great multitude, as few were disposed to take up arms for the king. Every means failed to bring the people to a sense of their duty and only a mere handful marched against the enemy. Gentry and clergy alike failed 'to retain their infatuated countrymen'. They were 'a wretched people blind to honour'. Many of them openly joined the invaders, and their adherence was measured by the strongest side. Over and over again Carleton lamented his disappointment and the ignorance, fear, credulity, and perverseness of the habitants. The Act failed in that those most conciliated by it were unable, for reasons of which Carleton took no heed, to rally the Canadians to arms—'the most ungrateful race under the sun'.¹

¹ Annual Register (1774), pp. 129] ff., 232].

² The Speech of Lord Lyttelton on a Motion made in the House of Lords for a Repeal of the Canada Bill, May 17, 1775, p. 4 (London, 1775) (Canadian Archives).

The Act failed in intimidating the southern colonies. The day had passed when a French colony on their north would stay their hands. The political ferment was already at its height, and the colonists whom French intrigue in land and trade and Indian affairs had failed to unite were now ready to draw a single sword in self-defence. Acts of parliament were consolidating their ranks, and the Quebec Act instead of being a deterrent became a violent irritant to their purpose.

The Act laid on Quebec the old seigniorial and ecclesiastical system and buttressed up institutions which were already losing hold on the habitants. It is also claimed that the presence of a solid French-Canadian group in modern Canada with all its attendant political difficulties can be traced to the folly of the Act. Many political thinkers, quite apart from racial and religious prejudices, believe that a less complete recognition of French-Canadianism in 1774 would have been acceptable to the French-Canadians and would have eliminated such problems as are evident to-day in relation to race, creed, and education. They point to Louisiana, where no difficulties have arisen out of a failure to grant privileges. But it is futile to discuss the wisdom of the Act from the might-have-beens of history.

¹ Carleton's dispatches, from June 7, 1775, to September 28, 1776, which throw light on the history, are in State Papers, Q. 11 and Q. 12 (Canadian Archives).

On the other hand, the Act saved the province, if we contemplate a situation in which priest and seignior had combined to rally the people against Great Britain—a situation made all the more dubious when France joined in alliance with the colonies. The United States might not have tolerated the perpetuation of French customs in the union, but the idea of Vergennes to make Canada an autonomous province under French suzerainty was not outside practical politics. The general indifference of the French-Canadians saved the situation, and even Lafayette failed to move them from their apathetic mentality. The decisive factor was the loyalty of the clergy and seigniors. Carleton indeed built better than he knew. The loyalty of the French-Canadian church and upper classes was secured and proved a powerful influence against disintegration. Not only in the American revolution, but in the French revolution, the Napoleonic wars, in 1812, and in the rebellions of 1837, the church and upper classes in Quebec set their faces like flint against organized treason and dismembering sedition.

It was a blessing for Canada that the Quebec Act settled the status of the Roman catholic church and removed it for generations out of that damnosa haereditas—religious politics. Had its position been left in the air without a statute behind it, the coming of the United Empire loyalists might have added another war of religion to the tragedies of history. As it was, the transition to a new constitution was infinitely less complicated. It is fair to state, however, that in the width of the concessions and in the comprehensiveness of the guarantees, little place was left for give and take, and there was thus eliminated much of the sweet reasonableness of compromise. To hold on and not to move, to fear further claims and to be on guard, are a large price to pay. Quebec has brought essential and vital and characteristic gifts to the life of Canada, and they can be traced to the influence of the Roman catholic church satisfied in 1774. In so far as Quebec is to-day a strong centrifugal force it can be traced to 1774. One thing is certain, the Quebec Act strengthened the imperial tie, and we may too lightly exaggerate the defects and too lightly appreciate the virtues.

Quot homines, tot sententiae. In that subtle tantalizing world of human motive and human endeavour it is seldom possible to reconstruct history, had circumstances been different. There is nothing easier than to say this might have been, that might have happened, when dealing with the inconstant play of the human will—but these are the métier of idlers and of dreamers. All that can be hoped for, in dealing with such a question as the Quebec Act, is to set down naught in malice, and to attempt to avoid the advocate in trying to be the judge.

[AUTHORITIES.—Most of the documents are in A. Shortt and A. G. Doughty, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1759–1791 (Ottawa, 1918); Egerton and Grant, Canadian Constitutional Development (Toronto, 1907); Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759–1915 (Oxford, 1918); State Papers, Q. 11 and Q. 12 (Canadian Archives). The debates are in Cavendish, Debates on . . . the Bill . . . for the Government of the Province of Quebec (London, 1839). The pamphlet literature is of great importance. William Knox's Justice and Policy of the late Act of Parliament, &c. (London, 1774), should be read in connexion with his Extra Official State Papers (London, 1789); Lyttelton's (?) Letter to William Pitt, Earl of Chatham (New York, 1774) and Speech on a motion . . . for Repeal of the Canada Bill (London 1775) throw light on the policy of the ministry. V. Coffin, The Province of Quebec and the Early American Revolution (Wisconsin, 1896), is useful, but narrow in outlook and lacking in wide historical background. (See an important review by Adam Shortt in Review of Historical Publications relating to Canada, vol. i, pp. 68 ff.) Justin H. Smith, Our Struggle for the Fourteenth Colony: Canada and the American Revolution (2 vols., New York, 1907), contains a mass of material. Abbé Lionel Groulx, Vers l'émancipation (Montreal, 1921), has an interesting chapter on the Quebec Act. A. G. Bradley, Lord Dorchester (Toronto, 1907), is a useful introduction to the period, but lacks documentation and authorities.]

CHAPTER VIII

THE COMING OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

IF the American revolution was influenced by the Quebec Act the revolution in its turn influenced Canada. Canada lost the territories south and west of the great lakes which had been included in the province. Arbitrary government was accentuated during the war. The progress of hostilities and the peace of 1783 brought into Canada a crowd of loyalists, who created a new situation with their just claims on a home under the British crown. Their advanced political thought, their experience in popular institutions, and their objections to arbitrary government not a whit removed from those of the triumphant colonists were bound to upset such equilibrium, in political, social and religious life, as existed in Canada. The American revolution made a new constitutional development inevitable.

When the revolutionary war was over, the boundaries remained to some extent unsettled and Great Britain held the western trading posts till 1794, hoping that the United States would in some way compensate the loyalists. The new boundary was defined in a long and detailed clause of the treaty,¹ but imperfect maps led to a series of boundary disputes which are best considered here. The north-west angle of Nova Scotia was exceedingly hard to find or to define, and a line due west from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi did not at all come near that river. It was only in 1818 that a line was agreed on, and the 49th parallel of north latitude became the boundary line west of the Lake of the Woods, while that between Maine and New Brunswick was not settled till the

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 167 ff.

Ashburton Treaty of 1842.¹ The American 'wedge' thus created was a feature against federation in 1867.

Owing to the progress and issues of the war, the Quebec Act was almost a dead letter, and students are thus robbed of an opportunity to watch an interesting constitutional experiment completely at work. The political institutions of Canada did not pass unscathed through the ordeal. Carleton, who had returned to Canada in 1774, began with a clean slate, as the Quebec Act swept away all ordinances relating to civil government and the administration of justice before May 1, 1775. The revolutionary war made him more than ever careful. He organized in April 1775 a temporary court of common pleas,² but he had no intention of being either rash or communicative. He withheld his instructions and concealed concessions,³ lest the seigniors should be alienated in a difficult situation which rendered the proclamation of martial law necessary.⁴ His hands were full not merely with the war situation in Canada but with dispatches from home. The possibilities of French-Canadian assistance, as a return for the grant of the old laws and customs, now loomed up. Carleton's former estimates of the situation were recalled, and he was asked to furnish at first three thousand and later six thousand Canadian troops.⁵ When at length disappointment, invasion, and intrigue allowed a resumption of civil government, Carleton was as far from concessions as ever.

Civil jurisdiction was organized, July 23, 1776, in the district of Quebec,⁶ and in the following August a court of

¹ For a discussion (with detailed references) of the various boundary problems, see W. Houston, Documents illustrative of the Canadian Constitution, app. A, B (Toronto, 1891).

² Quebec Gazette, April 27, 1775.

³ See above, pp. 55 ff.

⁴ Masères, Additional Papers concerning the Province of Quebec (London 1776), p. 170 (Proclamation of June 9, 1775).

⁵ Dartmouth to Carleton, July 1, 1775, State Papers, Q. 11, p. 152; same to same, July 24, 1775, ibid., p. 182.

⁶ Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 674 ff.

appeal was set up consisting of the governor and council.¹ Early in 1777 the civil and criminal courts were reorganized and their proceedings regulated.² These ordinances reproduced essentially the system at work between 1770 and the Quebec Act; but civil cases were withdrawn from the king's bench, where theoretically English law prevailed, and the optional use of juries to decide facts was discontinued, provision, however, being made to hear evidence according to English law. Carleton maintained that juries would spoil his regulations, and a motion in their favour was voted down.³ Captains of militia were revived as coroners and peace officers throughout the parishes. The governor and council acquired a judicial power which, added to their executive and legislative functions, recalled the authority of the old sovereign council. The very name of jury was ruled out and French-Canadians resumed local administrative functions. The French note was distinct throughout. American conditions reacting on the province raised a storm which was long and bitter. Carleton's estimate of his plans is noteworthy: 'these ordinances have been framed upon the principle of securing the dependence of this province upon Great Britain, of suppressing that spirit of licentiousness and independence that has pervaded all the British colonies upon this continent, and was making, through the endeavours of a turbulent faction here, a most amazing progress in this country.'⁴

The storm began early with petitions from the traders, and gathered strength at the period when Haldimand was brought to book for disobedience to official orders.⁵ In the reprimand, the privy council referred the whole subject of the administration of justice to the governor and council, and asked for a report. The administration became divided on definite racial lines.

¹ Ibid., pp. 672 ff.

² Ibid., pp. 679 ff.

³ Minutes of the Legislative Council, D, p. 13.

⁴ Carleton to Germain, May 9, 1777, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 676.

⁵ See above, pp. 53, 56.

Haldimand inherited Carleton's outlook and training. He had no experience as a civil governor and conditions made him suspicious and nervous. He feared changes and he supported the narrowest terms of the laws and ordinances. Carrying the majority of his council with him he crushed every movement in favour of English commercial law and the writ of habeas corpus. Professing an entire indifference to the form of government, he considered the rigid interpretation of the Quebec Act as ideally adapted for Canada.¹ When the war was over and the peace signed, the party in the council opposed to arbitrary rule grew stronger. Led by two imperial officials, Lieutenant-Governor Hamilton and Hugh Finlay, the deputy postmaster-general, they succeeded in forcing Haldimand to grant the substance of habeas corpus. After Haldimand's departure, the new policy enjoyed a brief temporary triumph. In 1785 an ordinance was passed granting the right of trial by jury in civil cases and in personal actions for damages.² There, however, the encroachment on the scheme of the Quebec Act stopped. Hamilton, the lieutenant-governor, was dismissed from office, and a successor was found in Brigadier-General Hope, one of Haldimand's right-hand men, on whose zeal and discretion the king relied to put down party spirit.³ At once there was a reversion to the old policy.⁴ It might thus appear that the American revolution was about to leave an unfortunate legacy to Canada of arbitrary and bureaucratic government, but it produced in reality a change which might not otherwise have taken place until modern times. With the coming of the loyalists new forces began to work. At first small and inarticulate and only used to support older positions, they at length

¹ Haldimand to North, October 24, 1783, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., p. 737.

² Ibid., pp. 780 ff.

³ Sydney to Hope, August 20, 1785, State Papers, Q. 25, p. 35 (Canadian Archives).

⁴ Hope to Sydney, November 2, 1785, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit. pp. 793 ff.

became strong enough to produce developments whose form lasted for half a century and whose principles remained permanent in the constitution.

When Carleton returned to Quebec late in 1786 as Baron Dorchester, he faced a situation in which the old internal difficulties had become more complicated and those outside more serious. France was standing on the threshold of a movement destined to rock the foundations of the civilized world. In the United States, one of the great new political parties was full of hatred for Great Britain and of resentment against its opponents because Quebec had not been added to the triumphant colonies. In Quebec itself every old sore lay open. In addition, a newer Canada was being carved out of the virgin forest by those who had passed through dark waters to new homes in a French province. Petitions and movements for change had continued intermittently from 1774, but after the conclusion of the war a new series began, more concrete and more emphatic. The financial situation of the province had become precarious and once more the prospect of a house of assembly loomed up. Naturally the French-Canadians protested, but the scheme took form. All the older points of vantage were maintained, but there were notes of peace. The proposals included 'new' as well as 'old subjects', and a recognition that the concessions to the Roman catholic church were permanent. On the other hand, the repeal of the Quebec Act was demanded.¹ There was also an important new addition to the statement of claims. The coming of the loyalists was emphasized and the fact that the régime of a French feudal province was hardly likely to command their adherence or sympathy. On their side the French-Canadians recognized the essence of the Quebec Act, when they protested that their only desire was to continue as before the conquest.² Before long the loyalists began to plead their own cause and petitioned for a separate government distinct from the province of Quebec.¹ In the legislative council, their position added force to the old faction fights which broke out once more over proposals to give the loyalists some independent petty jurisdictions, and 'to render the British constitution desirable as well as venerable'. For the moment everything was held up with the announcement that nothing would be done until Carleton had come to the province once more and had reported on the new conditions.²

¹ Petition of November 24, 1784, ibid., pp. 742 ff.

² Ibid., p. 766.

A pathetic interest gathers round this period of Carleton's rule in Canada. A quiet process of change had been taking place in his mind. He saw even before he arrived the necessity of removing voluntarily every burden which might render the constitutional position of the inhabitants of Canada inferior to that of the United States and lead to changes of allegiance.³ Perhaps no one better could have been selected, and he showed wisdom when he made his acceptance of the appointment conditional on the help of William Smith as chief justice, who had had wide legal and judicial experience in New York. Quite apart from the altered circumstances, the first thing that must have struck the new Baron Dorchester was the fact that his pet constitution, so carefully guarded by Haldimand and Hope, had proved a failure. The council was no longer tractable. He succeeded, however, in getting committees appointed to inquire into the state of the province.⁴ The records of the investigation leave the impression that, with the best of goodwill, no one could either have succeeded in carrying out the principles of law and equity or have failed to escape charges of injustice and favouritism.⁵ It gradually dawned on

¹ Petition, April 11, 1785, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 773 ff.

² Sydney to Hope, April 6, 1786, ibid., pp. 805 ff.

³ Memorandum of February 20, 1786, State Papers, Q. 26. 1, p. 53.

⁴ Dorchester to Sydney, June 13, 1787, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 865 ff.

⁵ Ibid., pp. 874 ff.

Dorchester that the régime under the Quebec Act was over. For the moment he was not sure of his mind. He could only advise that the system of land tenure be changed, reserving in every township five thousand acres as crown lands.¹ In the cabinet a plan had begun to crystallize. At the close of 1787 it was hinted to Dorchester that the province might be divided, and his opinion was asked.² The path was made no easier when private members of the house of commons began to urge action and to introduce bills. It was an extraordinary picture. After thirty years of British rule nothing was stable, no one secure. Faction, race, privileges, and counter privileges trip over one another in the records against a sad enough background of hardship, and often of actual struggles for existence. Where material conditions were better, passion was always prepared to break out, and the pens of ready writers never seemed to dry as attack and defence continued their petitions to the governor or to the crown.

Dorchester had scarcely created and organized new districts,³ when Adam Lymburner appeared before the house of commons on behalf of those who desired a house of assembly. In a singularly calm manner he advanced reasonable arguments in favour of representative institutions and English commercial law.⁴ The debate which followed was insincere, partisan, and ill-informed; but Pitt took the situation in hand and promised official action during next session, while Dorchester once more was urged to reconsider a problem which must long ago have become a perfect nightmare to him. The division of the province seems to have been the cabinet's most constant plan, and to the idea the governor's attention was specially drawn.⁵

¹ Dorchester to Sydney, June 13, 1787, ibid., pp. 946 ff.

² Sydney to Dorchester, September 20, 1787, ibid., pp. 863 ff.

³ Ibid., pp. 953 ff. and 963 ff.

⁴ The 'Paper read at the Bar of the House of Commons by Mr. Lymburner', State Papers, Q. 62-A. 1, pp. 1 ff. (Canadian Archives).

⁵ Sydney to Dorchester, September 3, 1788, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 954 ff.

In reply Dorchester opposed division: 'A division of the province, I am of an opinion, is by no means advisable at present, either for the interests of the new or the ancient districts, nor do I see an immediate call for other regulations than such as are involved in the subject of the general jurisprudence of the country. Indeed, it appears to me that the western settlements are as yet unprepared for any organization superior to that of a county. This has lately been given to them. . . . But though I hold a division of the province at present inexpedient, yet I am of opinion that no time should be lost in appointing a person of fidelity and ability, in the confidence of the loyalists, to superintend and lead them, and to bring their concerns with dispatch to the knowledge of government under the title of lieutenant-governor of the four western districts above named. Should a division of the province notwithstanding be determined by the wisdom of his majesty's councils, I see no reason why the inhabitants of those western districts should not have an assembly.'¹

In October 1789 the British government had made up its mind, and William Grenville forwarded to Dorchester the earliest draft of the new constitution, providing for the division of the province with an executive council and assembly in each division and 'an hereditary legislative council, distinguished by some mark of honour'.² The covering dispatches throw light on the conception. The aim was to assimilate the constitution to that of Great Britain, while at the same time to grant concessions as favours before they were extorted by necessity. The creation of a titled colonial aristocracy was destined to give the Upper House 'a greater degree of weight and consequence than was possessed by the councils in the old colonial governments, and to establish in the provinces a body of men having that motive of attachment to the existing form of government which arises from the possession of personal or hereditary distinction'. The distinct racial groupings in the upper and lower divisions of the province suggested 'separate legislatures, rather than that these two bodies of people should be blended together in the first formation of the new constitution'. 'The state of France is such as gives us little to fear from that quarter in the present moment. The opportunity is therefore most favourable for the adoption of such measures as may tend to consolidate our strength and increase our resources, so as to enable ourselves to meet any efforts that the most favourable event in the present troubles can ever enable her to make.'¹ Once again, as in 1774, external policy helps to govern the situation. The lesson from the revolutionary war was to make the British constitution a reality in Canada, and the French-Canadians must be considered and consolidated in order to cut off any disadvantages in case of war with France.

¹ Dorchester to Sydney, November 8, 1788, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 958 ff.

² William Knox seems to have been the first to suggest a special colonial aristocracy. On the eve of the American revolution he drew up a memorandum for the cabinet in which he referred to the plan: 'My second object was to amend the colonial constitutions by creating an aristocratic estate in them.' Extra Official State Papers, p. 30.

Dorchester replied enclosing a draft drawn up in co-operation with Chief Justice Smith. There was no discussion of the wisdom of the policy. A few details called for attention. The boundary must be made vague owing to outstanding difficulties with the United States. Honours and titles would ill suit conditions and were better omitted. A wider vision breaks momentarily across the history. Dorchester began to think of a united British North America and enclosed the plan of an embryo federal system drawn up by the chief justice.² Dorchester's draft did not arrive in time to allow for the introduction of legislation in the session of 1790 ; but in the following session the king's message¹ drew attention to the policy, and early in March 1791 William Pitt introduced the bill in the house of commons, in a short speech which outlined the royal purpose. During the progress of the bill Lymburner was heard against any division of the province and several unimportant changes were made. On May 18 the bill passed through the house of commons and was assented to on June 19, 1791.

¹ Grenville to Dorchester (two dispatches), October 20, 1789, Shortt and Doughty, op. cit., pp. 969 ff. and 987 ff.

² Dorchester to Grenville, February 8, 1790, ibid., pp. 1002 ff.

British North America thus acquired representative institutions in all its governments. For a period, Nova Scotia had been administered by a governor or lieutenant-governor with the aid of a council, which acted in an executive and legislative capacity. Attention, however, was called to the fact that the governor's instructions contemplated an assembly. Governor Lawrence put off summoning it, pleading the scattered population, but more than likely being influenced by the coming shadow of the Seven Years War. Finally, the imperial government informed him that, as the settlers had been promised an assembly, it must be called. This peremptory command was founded on the fact that the law officers of the crown had given an opinion that legislative power in the province was probably exercised in an illegal manner apart from an elected chamber. As a consequence, the first popularly elected parliament ever summoned in what is now British North America met at Halifax, October 7, 1758.² Prince Edward Island, which had been placed under the government of Nova Scotia in 1763, was created a separate colony in 1769 under a lieutenant-governor and council acting as executive and legislature. For similar reasons to those which affected Nova Scotia an assembly was organized and met in 1773. In 1784, owing to the influx of United Empire loyalists, New Brunswick was carved out of Nova Scotia and created a province with a council acting in the time-honoured dual capacity, and an assembly.¹

¹ 'State Papers,' February 25, 1795, Annual Register for 1791 (London, 1795), p. 124*.

² Selections from the Public Documents relating to Nova Scotia (Halifax, 1869).

The Constitutional Act of 1791² needs careful analysis. The Act did not divide Quebec, but assumed that such a division would take place. Various suggestions had been made to get over diplomatic friction with the United States, but as these proved futile the boundaries were left for a subsequent order in council. The Quebec Act was repealed, in so far as it related to the appointment and powers of the council, and legislative authority was vested in the governor or lieutenant-governor acting with the advice and consent of the legislative council and assembly in each of the two new provinces. The legislative council, consisting of at least seven members in Upper Canada and fifteen in Lower Canada, was to consist of persons summoned under the great seal of the province. Additional members could be added by royal direction. All members were to be over twenty-one years of age and natural-born or naturalized British subjects. Membership was for life, and permission was given (though it was never exercised) to create a provincial nobility whose members could demand a writ of summons to the legislative council. The governor appointed and could remove the speaker of the council.

The king was to authorize the governor to call the house of assembly and to divide the provinces by proclamation into electoral districts. The minimum number of members was sixteen in Upper Canada and fifty in Lower Canada. The franchise was wide. The right to vote in rural districts was based on a forty shilling freehold or its equivalent in any other tenure, while in towns it was granted to those who possessed a residence valued at five pounds or rented at ten pounds and had resided at least one year in the province. Members of the provincial council and all clergymen were ineligible for seats in the assembly. There was no property qualification for membership. The provincial parliament was to be summoned once in every twelve months, and was not to continue longer than four years ; but the governor could dissolve it at any time. When a bill had passed both houses, the governor could assent to it, reject it, or reserve it for the king's pleasure. Even a bill to which his assent had been given might be disallowed by the British government any time inside two years. The governor and executive council were constituted as a court of appeal, with the right of appeal from them to the privy council.

¹ Canada, Sessional Papers, 1883, No. 70.

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 207 ff. (31 Geo. III, c. 31).

The question of religion was dealt with in careful detail. The guarantees of the Quebec Act to the church of Rome were confirmed, and previous instructions relating to tithes from protestants for the support of protestant clergy were continued. A new provision, however, for the latter was added. The governor was authorized ' to make from and out of the lands of the crown within such provinces such allotment and appropriation of lands for the support and maintenance of a protestant clergy within the same as may bear a due proportion to the amount of such lands within the same as have at any time been granted by or under the authority of his majesty '. The proportion was fixed as ' equal in value to the seventh part of the lands so granted '. All rents arising from these ' clergy reserves ' were to be devoted exclusively to the support of a protestant clergy. At the same time provision was made for royal authorization to the governor and executive council to erect parsonages or rectories ' according to the establishment of the church of England ', and to endow them with such sections of the clergy reserves as the council should deem expedient. Presentation to such parsonages was a royal gift, but spiritual jurisdiction over them was placed in the hands of the bishop of Nova Scotia. The parsons were ' to have all rights, profits, and emoluments, . . . as fully and amply . . .

as the incumbent of a parsonage or rectory in England'. An elaborate enactment covered local legislation, repealing and modifying these and former provisions touching religion. Such legislation was not unconstitutional; but the king could not assent until it had lain before both the British houses of parliament for thirty days; and his assent must be withheld if either house within that time addressed his majesty to withhold his assent. In any case, no such legislation could be made fully valid unless the provincial parliament, in the same session as it had passed such legislation, addressed the governor or lieutenant-governor describing the Act and asking that it should be transmitted to England for such consideration as that outlined. The royal supremacy, as asserted in the Quebec Act, remained unrepealed; but the forms of the oaths in the bill recognized religious equality.

The new constitution also dealt with trade and commerce and land tenure. All lands in the new province were henceforth to be granted in free and common socage, and grants made in feudal tenure in this new province before 1791 could be changed on petition into grants in socage tenure. In Lower Canada the settler could obtain grants in socage tenure if he desired to do so, but subject to such alterations in its nature and consequence as the legislature of the province with the king's consent might determine. A section covered the commercial relations between the provinces and Great Britain. It recited an Act¹ passed during the revolutionary war, in which the parliament of Great Britain declared that it would pass no Act imposing duty, tax, or assessment for the purpose of raising a revenue in any colony, excepting only such duties as might be expedient for the regulation of commerce. It was considered 'necessary for the general benefit of the British Empire' that this power should be retained, and as a consequence nothing in the Constitutional Act could be construed to prevent the king from regulating navigation and commerce between Upper and Lower Canada or between either and Great Britain, or any other colony or foreign state, or to give the local parliaments power to vary, repeal, or obstruct such regulations. The net product, however, of such duties was to be applied to the use of the respective provinces.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 165 ff. (18 Geo. III, c. 12).

On August 24, 1791, an order in council divided the province of Quebec into Upper and Lower Canada,¹ and instructed the secretary of state to prepare a warrant authorizing the governor of the province to fix a date for the commencement of the Act within the provinces not later than December 31, 1791. On November 18 Alured Clarke issued a proclamation bringing the Act into effect on December 26, 1791.² In September 1791 Dorchester's commission and instructions were issued as governor-in-chief of Upper and Lower Canada, and Alured Clarke and John Graves Simcoe were appointed lieutenant-governors of Lower and Upper Canada respectively.³ On May 7, 1792, Clarke divided Lower Canada into twenty-seven electoral districts returning fifty members to the house of assembly, and in the following July Simcoe divided Upper Canada into nineteen counties which were to elect sixteen members.⁴

When we turn to consider the debates⁵ on the Constitutional Act certain principles governing the new constitution appear. The division of the province was intended to put an end to the competition between the French-Canadians and the British.

¹ A. G. Doughty and D. A. McArthur, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1791-1818, pp. 3 ff. (Ottawa, 1914).

² Ibid., pp. 55 ff. Clarke was appointed lieutenant-governor of Quebec March 19, 1790, and began his duties in the following October. When Dorchester left for England in August 1791, Clarke administered the government of Lower Canada until Dorchester's return in September 1793.

³ Ibid., pp. 5 ff., 54 ff.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 72 ff.

⁵ See the Annual Register for 1791; History and Proceedings of the Lords and Commons ('Parliamentary Debates') (London, 1791); Robert Gourlay, Statistical Account of Upper Canada, vol. ii (London, 1822).

The idea was distinctly stated by Pitt : the creation of two separate colonies which should be left to work out their own destinies. The guiding force, however, was the reproduction as far as possible in each province of the eighteenth-century British constitution, with a local aristocracy and an established church. This reproduction was to act as a kind of charm. It was to prevent the repetition of the first great colonial tragedy ; and Pitt actually believed that Lower Canada, seeing the beneficent workings of this venerable constitution in the neighbouring province, would sigh for the gift and embrace the whole system from conviction. He dropped no hint in public, as Grenville had done in private, of possible trouble and war with France and of the necessity to conciliate French Canada, but he declared that the division aimed at satisfying both races in order finally to unite them. The future unity was to come, because the French-Canadians, initially satisfied by being separated from the British, would actually become dissatisfied because of the separation. They would finally sink race, religion, and traditions and rush to accept the British constitution out of sheer jealousy, lest Upper Canada should enjoy a monopoly in such a life-giving, wonder-working scheme. Division would suit the ' jarring interests ' and ' opposing views ' of the present ; but the very example of the ' image and transcript of the British constitution ' would compel union. It would be a leaven to leaven the whole lump. The shadow of Abbé Sieyès must have fallen over Pitt during the debate, for it is seldom that a constitution was formed on such principles. Pitt feared racial strife ; but he was prepared to use provincial jealousies in order to produce union. Nature was against his benevolent purpose. The discord lay deep in the heart of Lower Canada, and while that rankled Lower Canada would look with no longing to Upper Canada to heal constitutional trouble. The British in Lower Canada had opposed the division of the province. They had spoken in clear-cut terms through Adam Lymburner at the bar of the house of commons. It is no judgement based on experience that would criticize Pitt. To Dorchester information had been given that the danger in Europe necessitated the consolidation of every available interest in the Empire. Grenville made it clear that concession to the French-Canadians was an international necessity. They were to be kept quiet from possible French influences in case of a European war, by having their nationality recognized and buttressed in a province where numerical superiority would guarantee their predominating influence. That is one point of view. In due course, having fulfilled this function in international policy, this nationalism was to dissolve and fade out of a convinced and voluntary desire to possess in its entirety the whole administrative scheme of an alien race. Such sublime faith, like all sublime faiths, can only be ascribed to ignorance—ignorance of Canada, of history, of nationality. While Burke was giving way to frenzied temper and Fox was wiping eyes tear-stained over a broken friendship, Pitt was inaugurating a constitutional experiment in Canada which could never produce the results which he intended. Constitutions are not supernatural. They flourish and are successful where they reflect social development, and where the friction in the political machine is reduced to the lowest point. Pitt's Constitutional Act was charged with friction, and in time Upper Canada found the eighteenth-century British constitution an excuse for radicalism, and Lower Canada used it to increase rather than to diminish separatist tendencies.

The period in Canadian history which follows is almost the inevitable working out of failure. This failure is due not merely to the short-sightedness of Pitt's general principles, but to the functioning of institutions under the Constitutional Act. Each province must be considered separately. Upper Canada will provide illustrations differing from Lower Canada, and separate treatment will bring to light varied points of view in the interaction of similar institutions and different social and economic and racial conditions. It will then be possible to study the failure of representative government under broad generalizations derived from the history of each province, to which Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island will add their experiences.

[AUTHORITIES.—The documents are in A. Shortt and A. G. Doughty, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1759–1791 (Ottawa, 1918); A. G. Doughty and D. A. McArthur, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1791–1818 (Ottawa, 1914); Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759–1915 (Oxford, 1918); Egerton and Grant, Canadian Constitutional Development (Toronto, 1907). The debates are in Parliamentary Debates, 1791, and complete in R. Gourlay, Statistical Account of Upper Canada, vol. ii (London, 1822). The state papers are in State Papers, Q. 10–Q. 57. 2 (Canadian Archives). The pamphlet literature of importance includes Masères, Additional Papers concerning the Province of Quebec (London, 1776); State of the Present Form of Government of the Province of Quebec, &c. (London, 1789); Observations on a Pamphlet: 'State of the Present Form,' &c., by a citizen of Quebec (London, 1790); Thoughts on the Canada Bill (London, 1791).]

CHAPTER IX

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN LOWER CANADA, 1792-1838

LORD DORCHESTER sailed for England on August 18, 1791, and the duty of inaugurating the new constitution in Lower Canada fell to Major-General Alured Clarke, a soldier inexperienced in civil government. His first delicate problem was the division of the province into electoral districts and the regulation of representation. Except for a foolish nomenclature which introduced the names of English counties into a French colony, Clarke's plan was as successful as could be expected. Four members each were assigned to Montreal and Quebec, two to Three Rivers, one to William Henry, two to each of the twenty-one counties, except Orleans, Bedford, and Gaspé, which were each given one. For the moment the arrangement was equitable, but before long it failed to satisfy the growing cities and the Eastern Townships. The provincial or imperial legislature could amend the proclamation. The latter was unwilling to interfere and the former had little desire to organize a redistribution which would give greater representation to the British, and thus strengthen the hands of the executive in the assembly. When at length redistribution took place, the number of counties was increased, but the divisions in the cities and towns remained the same. The first provincial election took place in June 1792, and parliament met for business on December 17, with thirty-four French and sixteen British representatives. Historians are almost agreed in considering this first assembly the strongest during the period, including as it did some of the best men in the province.

It is a strange picture. The vast majority of the electors had no conception of the political machine which they were called on to create. Largely illiterate and uneducated, they could not have understood the scheme even had the seigniors been willing to give them more enlightenment upon it than that it contained a menace of taxation. The gift, if such it was, came unasked and unsought, and, if reports were true from the lost colonies, with no very creditable past. The grant itself is almost doctrinaire. An apathetic, conservative, docile, and non-political people were entrusted with a constitution implying knowledge and insight. No attempt had been made to instruct them in its ordinary workings, much less in those delicate, intangible conventions and indeterminate traditions which gave it force and vitality. The French-Canadians received the skeleton of an alien system in the hope that they would inevitably clothe it with profound respect, and, having done so, would seek union with Upper Canada. With them were associated British settlers who could not imagine why they had been given such strange political bed-fellows.

Unconsciously in the first assembly race clannishness appeared, to remain the fundamental problem of Lower Canadian history during the period. Jean Antoine Panet was elected speaker after a division on practically racial lines. His brother had the insight to see that the speaker ought to be bilingual and should address the governor in English as the general language of the empire.¹ The British members seized on the latter idea, but failed to convince the assembly. It early became a standing rule that the speaker should read a motion in English and French if he could do so ; if not, he should read it in the language most familiar to him, and the reading in the other language should be done by his clerk or deputy. There was a further difficulty over the language of enactment.² A motion to make English the legal language was lost, even though supported by the plea of imperial unity and by the suggestion that a subordinate legislature could not change the language of law. A decision was finally reached in which the assembly did not insist on French as the language of enactment, but agreed that bills respecting the criminal laws of England and the protestant clergy should be introduced in English, and those relating to the laws and usages of the province in French.¹ Clarke was thus saved the necessity of disagreement,² and the British government offered no objections to the use of both languages, but insisted on English as the language of law.³

¹ Quebec Gazette, December 20, 1792.

² See an important study Thomas Chapais, 'Les débuts du Régime parle-

The first parliament was prorogued, after passing some miscellaneous bills and drawing up rules of procedure, in a speech announcing war with France. Clarke noticed the general line of division. The French-Canadians were practically solid and controlled the house. The quorum was fixed so that no session could be held without a French-Canadian majority. Goodwill and patience had allayed much of the jealousy, but there was a distinct racial cleavage.⁴ On the other hand, an impression was abroad that organized efforts were being made to mould the assembly and council to the wishes of the English party.⁵

When Dorchester returned there was little opportunity for constitutional issues. The judicial system was carefully and elaborately organized under a judicature act, which remained the basis of the system in Lower Canada till the union.⁶ Strained relations with the United States and French propaganda in Canada occupied the attention of the executive and called for abnormal measures. But Dorchester had little mentaire : La question de langue ' (Le Canada Français, Sept.-Oct. 1918, pp. 11 ff., 95 ff.).

¹ Doughty and McArthur, op. cit., p. 105.

² Attorney-General Monk to Nepean, May 8, 1793, State Papers, Q. 66, p. 283 (Canadian Archives).

³ Dundas to Dorchester, October 2, 1793, ibid., Q. 65, p. 319.

⁴ Clarke to Dundas, July 3, 1793, ibid., Q. 63-2, p. 307.

⁵ Monk to Nepean, January 3, 1793, ibid., Q. 66, p. 261.

⁶ Doughty and McArthur, op. cit., pp. 125 ff.

sympathy with the new constitution. Doubtless he was getting old and irritable, and probably more conservative. At any rate he complained bitterly of the growing weakness of government owing to the division of the province. Whatever motives—political, military, or personal—may have lain behind his dispute with Lieutenant-Governor Simcoe, he was unable to rid his mind of the fatal policy of the Constitutional Act, with its ‘dividing and subdividing’, its ‘independent governments’ instead of unity and consolidation.¹ It was well that he did not remain in Canada to witness deeper failure, and that in his last speech he could congratulate the legislature on ‘unanimity, loyalty, and disinterestedness manifested by this first provincial parliament, which have never been surpassed in any of his majesty’s provincial dominions’.

There were undercurrents, however, which cannot be overlooked. French agents were planning an invasion of Canada, relying on the anti-British party in the United States. A new assembly, elected in September 1796, was mostly French-Canadian, and many of its members were suspect in the situation.² Indeed Prescott, Dorchester’s successor, feared to call it together on account of its complexion and the spirit of insubordination.³ When the storm clouds cleared, a new situation arose which disclosed a looseness in the constitutional structure. In attempting to reform glaring abuses in connexion with land grants, Prescott found that the executive on which he relied were the worst offenders. The actual dispute and its details are immaterial, but the lieutenant-governor, chief justice, and executive were soon at loggerheads. The growing consciousness of French-Canadian unity found comfort in the unedifying dispute among the British. The colonial office could only point with sorrow to the fatal effect of the jarring interests on executive authority and appeal to Prescott's 'good sense, integrity, and zeal' to regain control.¹ The rupture became a local scandal, and the chief justice attempted to form a party in the assembly in actual hostility to the governor.² Other disintegrating forces were at work. The Anglican bishop was urging greater consideration for his communion, and could not reconcile himself to the position granted to the Roman catholic church.³ Rumours were abroad that the royal supremacy might be brought into operation. The chief executive lost influence and power when the government passed to non-military administrators. When military authority lay in the hands of an officer in Upper Canada, the French-Canadians began to look down on their own governor.

¹ Dorchester to Portland, February 20, 1795, ibid., pp. 183 ff.

² Prescott to Portland, September 3, 1796, State Papers, Q. 77, p. 209.

³ Same to same, October 28, 1796, ibid., Q. 78, p. 14.

There was thus plenty of disorganization, jealousy, and fear abroad, when Robert Shore Milnes succeeded Prescott, and it was unfortunate that these should be accentuated in a racial issue under the régime of a well-disposed but rather futile civil governor. Milnes, however, wrote a dispatch which is of great value in throwing light on Lower Canada at the beginning of the nineteenth century. He noticed with fear the increase of popular power. The lessening of seigniorial authority, the independence of the Roman catholic church and priesthood, the disembodiment of the militia, and the endless discussions in a popular house of assembly had all combined to destroy aristocratic influence. More protestant settlers were needed, and the Roman catholic bishop must be induced to exercise his authority under government control by offering him an increased remuneration. Meanwhile it was a source of congratulation that the executive did not depend on the assembly for supplies, as nothing could be more fatal for authority than placing a colonial government under the financial thumb of a popular institution.¹ The British government shared Milnes's fears. They were prepared to do anything to improve the situation, and to allow the bishop almost any increase in order to bring the local clergy under the crown's undoubted power of issuing licences to them. An annual militia training lay in the executive's own hands, but the home authorities would encourage protestant settlers to offset the popular influence of the French-Canadians.² Before the new bulwarks of aristocracy could be erected, the executive government witnessed a popular episode of permanent and far-reaching importance.

¹ Portland to Prescott, October 11, 1798, State Papers, Q. 80-2, p. 435.

² Prescott to Portland, February 4, 1799, ibid., Q. 82, p. 126.

³ Bishop Mountain of Quebec to same, April 15, 1799, ibid., Q. 83, p. 332. Cf. same to Camden, October 24, 1804, ibid., Q. 96, p. 171.

A bill had been passed providing for the erection of common gaols in Quebec and Montreal and throwing the expense exclusively on the business and trading interests. The merchants petitioned against it, the assembly replied with counter petitions, and the bill was not disallowed.³ The matter might have rested there, had not the merchants of Montreal met in festive protest at Dillon's Tavern. The toasts included 'the legislative council friendly to constitutional taxation'; 'our representatives who proposed a proper mode of taxation'; 'may our representatives be divested of local prejudices'; 'prosperity to agriculture and commerce, may they aid each other by sharing a due proportion of advantages and burdens'. These toasts were drunk, while the band played 'Rule, Britannia', 'The Roast Beef of Old England', 'The Conquering Hero', and 'Britons, strike home'. The Montreal Gazette was accused by the house of assembly of a 'false, scandalous and malicious libel' in publishing an account of the jovial opposition. The Quebec Mercury entered the fray and widened the challenge beyond a mere question of privilege or of freedom of the press: 'this province is already too French for a British colony. Whether we are at war or in peace, it is essential that we should strive by all means to oppose the growth of the French and of their influence.' Within a few months the leaders of the French party established a newspaper to protect the interests of their race. In November 1806 the first number of Le Canadien appeared with the significant motto, 'Notre langue, nos institutions, et nos lois'. The controlling staff were Panet, the speaker of the house of assembly, and Pierre Stanislas Bédard, an influential member. The tone of the paper was outspoken, incisive, and blunt. There were no denunciations of England, but the local executive came in for many a broadside of direct attack in which an intimate knowledge of the older classical writers on the British constitution did good service. External circumstances gave the paper an historical importance. The necessity of combining the civil and military organization in the hands of the governor was more urgent than ever, and in October 1807 Sir James Henry Craig arrived at Quebec. He had spent most of his life on active service, and almost instinctively he began by carrying into the civil government of the province a military autocracy and discipline, which were all the more rigid owing to his state of health.

¹ Milnes to Portland, November 1, 1800, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 238 ff.

² Portland to Milnes, January 6, 1801, ibid., pp. 244 ff.

³ Cf. Milnes to Camden, April 12, 1805, State Papers, Q. 97, p. 59, and Dunn to Castlereagh, April 6, 1806, ibid., Q. 100, p. 62.

Craig found the actual framework of parties in existence. The merchants had begun to combine with the officials and the executive and legislative councils. This was the strongest group, because of their influence over actual administration. Opposed to them were the French-Canadians, who controlled the assembly, led by doctors, lawyers, and journalists. The episode of 'the gaols' Act' had helped to weld this group into something like a political party. It derived its real strength, however, from the fact that it represented the vast majority of the population and was bound together by the more subtle forces of race, language, and religion, intensified by suspicions of attack. It was Craig's misfortune to take into his confidence such extremists as Herman W. Ryland, his secretary, and Jonathan Sewell, the chief justice, who were both active in repressive policies. Ryland aimed to assimilate 'the colony in its religion, laws, and manners with the parent state';¹ while Sewell declared that 'the province must be converted into an English colony, or it will ultimately be lost'.²

The French-Canadian party—for such they can now be called—at once became aggressive. The exclusion of the judges from the house of assembly was a good enough platform, and certainly it irritated Craig. Prorogations brought little consolation, and when he dismissed five French-Canadians including Panet and Bédard from their militia commissions, he only consolidated the opposition. Nor did elections bring relief. Dissolution gave him opportunities to pour scorn on the assembly for 'its frivolous contests' and 'its abuse of its functions',³ but the opposing forces only appeared all the stronger, and in their strength he saw an ultimate goal of the subordination of the executive to the assembly, who 'either believe or affect to believe that there exists a ministry here, and that in imitation of the constitution of Britain that ministry is responsible to them for the conduct of government'.⁴ The British cabinet doubted the wisdom of Craig's methods and advised him at any rate to moderate his language and to control his tongue.⁵

A new assembly proved that Craig had misjudged the influence of the executive in electioneering, and that he had made a grave error in policy. The French-Canadians came back stronger and more solid than ever and with a very definite method of attack. Craig's more temperate speech in a glowing setting of British victories was met with a resolution that his previous addresses had been censures on the house and were dangerous attacks on the liberties of the subject.⁶ The resolution

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., p. 248.

² Ibid., p. 268.

³ House of Assembly, Journals, 1809, p. 302. Cf. Doughty and McArthur op. cit., pp. 360 ff.

⁴ Craig to Castlereagh, August 5, 1808, Kennedy, op. cit., p. 250.

⁵ Castlereagh to Craig, September 7, 1809, ibid., pp. 254 ff.

⁶ Doughty and McArthur, op. cit., pp. 365 ff.

might have been overlooked, but a more constructive policy followed. There were three sources of revenue in Lower Canada—firstly, the casual and territorial revenues of the crown; secondly, proceeds from duties and licences under the Quebec Revenue Act of 1774; thirdly, amounts voted by the local legislature. The first two were at the disposal of the crown. In February 1810 the assembly passed a resolution agreeing to vote the necessary sums for the civil expenses of the government of the province, and prepared an address to the king and British houses of parliament stating their unwillingness that the crown revenues should be used to defray provincial expenses. The move was obvious. The assembly were learning the power of the purse. Craig pointed out technical mistakes in procedure, but he agreed to forward the address to the king. Bédard challenged the governor's interpretation of constitutional custom, and the house proceeded to exclude the judges by resolution and to appoint an agent in London. The governor was shrewd enough to see the implication of every move, especially that the appointment of an agent aimed to hurt the local executive and that the assumption of provincial expenditure would make the assembly 'complete masters of the country'. He dissolved the house.¹ In March Craig carried the war farther into the enemy's camp. The 'seeds of pernicious principles among the ignorant' had been sown too long by 'the democratic party', and he determined 'to take decisive steps to quell the dissatisfaction'. He suppressed Le Canadien, and arrested the printers and three of the proprietors, including Bédard, 'on the charge of treasonable practices'.²

Craig's policy met with little success. He found church and race too powerful and the passion which he would have crushed was only intensified by his methods. He had no solution, but wavered between suspending the constitution and uniting the provinces.¹ Finally he sent Ryland to London, where for almost two years he tried in vain to induce the government to curb the powers of the Roman catholic church. Liverpool's government had its hands too full to reopen the Canadian question, and could only advise repeated doses of prorogation for such recalcitrant assemblies, while at the same time emphatically denying any possibility of bringing the executive under the control of the legislature. The 'nature of a colony' excluded any such arrangement.²

¹ For the whole history see Doughty and McArthur, pp. 366-78.

² Craig to Liverpool, March 24, 1810, State Papers, Q. 112, p. 55.

It is possible to excuse Craig's methods. He had great limitations, both natural and accidental. It was his misfortune not to understand local conditions. He looked for gentlemen and seigniors in the assembly, and he lamented that he could have nothing in common with 'shopkeepers', 'common habitants', 'the most ignorant of labouring farmers', 'blacksmiths', 'millers', 'even the advocate and notaries', 'not one person coming under the description of a Canadian gentleman'. His outlook made him despair of the future of a colony in which such social pariahs had a share in government.³ On the other hand, he had a difficult duty to perform, and he did it with soldierly brusqueness and honesty. Napoleon was still undefeated, French agents were active in Canada, the Roman catholic church in the province was not unfavourable to France since the Concordat, and feelings in the United States were none too friendly. No excuse can be offered for Ryland. It is a penetrating commentary on colonial affairs that a man like him should have acquired such influence. His failure was more fatal than success. He complicated the whole constitutional issue, for he brought into it religious hatred. There grew up in relation to his activities a state of mind which lent to political disputes the emotional strength of suppressed suspicion. It is a sad acknowledgement of failure that Craig should bid farewell to Canada confessing that among the French-Canadians the prevailing sentiments were mistrust, jealousy, envy, hatred : ' the line of distinction is completely drawn ; friendship and cordiality are not to be found, even common intercourse scarcely exists.' ¹

¹ Craig to Liverpool, May 1, 1810, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 256 ff.

² Liverpool to Craig, September 12, 1810, ibid., pp. 276 ff.

³ Craig to Liverpool, May 1, 1810, ibid., pp. 258, 264.

Much of this history may appear petty and unimportant and least of all constitutional. Craig's régime—' the reign of terror '—is vital in the development, in which race, language, finance and social life mingle with constitutional history. It will be possible to move more quickly over the policy and work of his successors, to curtail as it were the central acts of the tragedy ; but his government cannot be minimized. During it the organization took place of most of those forces which wrecked the constitution of 1791. French-Canadian nationalism realized itself, and on that realization was begun a structure which gave Lower Canada a particularly irritating constitutional problem. Perhaps the greatest misfortune of Craig's rule was that no one in England seemed to notice how successful it had been in disclosing the failure of the machinery of government. The attitude towards the constitution of 1791 continued to be one of a profound respect, which excluded the contemplation of change. Governor after governor was sent out to tighten or to loosen the administrative screw as the personnel of the colonial office fluctuated ; but no one thought that the failure lay in the screw. Meanwhile French-Canadians increased their solidarity. Their programme may not have been constructive, clear or logical ; but this at least can be said for it, it was just as valid as that which emanated from the colonial office, from whose well-intentioned ignorance, in the final analysis, the most loyal men in both provinces devoutly prayed to be delivered.

Extremes had failed. The blustering rigour of the soldier had created a grave enough situation. The local oligarchy, the

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., p. 256.

'bureaucrats' or 'château clique', stood face to face with a practically solid French-Canadian opposition. Without much apparent grasp of the situation or of the manner in which a change of policy would be interpreted, an era of conciliation was begun by Craig's successor, Sir George Prevost. The change doubtless produced good results during the war of 1812, but constitutionally it was liable to misinterpretation. When the militia officers whom Craig had cashiered were restored, and when Bédard was made a judge, there was a danger that conciliation might be mistaken for surrender, and moderation be interpreted as weakness. The motive behind these dealings seems in fact to have been the necessity during a war period for internal harmony and goodwill. There was no change of heart. Prevost deliberately set himself to cultivate the French-Canadians, as he found conciliation the only method by which 'he could hope to carry his measures'.¹ His success was a personal one, and in debates none the less passionate the assembly distinguished between him and his 'evil-disposed advisers'.² There was growing up also a constitutional consciousness, which found actual expression during his government. In petitions against Prevost's recall the French-Canadians' point of view was clearly expressed. It was a source of complaint that offices were filled by British, that the house of assembly was regarded as a foreign body, and that the only communication between the representatives of the people and the government was by means of 'conseillers et gens en place de la minorité, qui étant rivaux de la majorité sont peu propres à la bien représenter'. Disloyalty had become a pet term in the mouths of the governing class, and the province was split into factional fragments. The governors who were advised by British officials gradually came to believe that the French-Canadians were 'mauvais sujets toujours opposés à leur gouvernement et aux Anglais'. On the other hand, if a governor showed the least favour to the French-Canadians the 'gens en place' were consumed with jealousy and hatred. As a remedy an interesting suggestion was made: 'La Chambre d'Assemblée offre un moyen d'en obtenir d'une manière régulière, sans que ce soit sur les recommandations de ceux du parti anglais. Si le Gouvernement avait le pouvoir d'appeler au conseil les principaux membres de la majorité de la Chambre d'Assemblée, il aurait par là un moyen d'entendre les deux partis, et de n'être point obligé de ne connaître l'un que par les informations reçues de l'autre, il ne serait plus privé des connaissances et des conseils qu'il pourrait tirer des anciens habitans du pays, et nécessité de n'écouter que ceux qui viennent du parti opposé, qui n'est pas celui où il y a le plus de connaissance du pays, ni le plus d'intérêts conformes à ceux du pays.'¹

¹ Prevost to Bathurst. September 4, 1814, State Papers, Q. 128-1, p. 208.

² Same to same, March 18, 1814, ibid., Q. 127, p. 264.

Sir John Coape Sherbrooke continued a policy of tactful humouring. He succeeded in pacifying the assembly over their supposed right of impeachment. He enlisted on his side the conciliating power of the Roman catholic bishop,² to whom he gave a seat on the executive council,³ and he recommended that the speaker of the house of assembly should also be appointed to that body in order to establish confidence in the government.⁴ It was due to him that the British cabinet decided to permit the legislature to vote the expenses of the province apart from the territorial revenue of the crown and the duties under imperial Acts. Sherbrooke laid a financial statement before the assembly in 1818 with an estimate of expenditure and pointed out how far it fell short of monies at the disposal of the crown. After long debate the house voted the estimated deficit. The triumph, however, was personal, and even then it was partial. The

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 282 ff.

² Sherbrooke to Bathurst, February 1, 1817, State Papers, Q. 143, p. 126.

³ Same to same, January 1, 1817, ibid., p. 1; same to same, February 5, 1818, ibid., Q. 148-1, p. 117.

⁴ Same to same, April 21, 1817, ibid., Q. 143, p. 392.

assembly voted supplies only for a year, and with a perversity which soon became incarnate in Louis Joseph Papineau, their speaker, they failed to recognize the obvious triumph which they had won and refused to meet the British government half-way by making permanent provision for administration in a civil list. Sherbrooke's successor, the duke of Richmond, faced another financial crisis. With the personal element absent, the assembly took the entire estimates into consideration and examined charges against the crown revenue as minutely as those against provincial income. They treated the financial proposals as though they had control of them by constitutional law. They reduced salaries at will and censured officials by omitting their remunerations. Naturally the legislative council promptly refused to pass such arbitrary estimates. Apparently a civil list was out of the question, but it might have been possible to have tided over difficulties by annual grants. The assembly, however, claimed two things: to control the whole machinery of government by recasting at pleasure the estimates made by the executive, and to do so by treating the legislative council as non-existent. In addition, the majority had found in Papineau a fitting leader for exploiting the doctrinaire theories of the new liberalism. Where Bédard would have yielded to legalism and accepted a constitutional triumph, Papineau was stubborn and virtually demanded that the constitution should be at once abandoned. What Bédard lacked in visionary enthusiasm, Papineau supplied a hundred-fold. Bédard objected to the governor's patronizing speech to the assembly 'at the close of a session as at the last judgement the good were separated from the bad and each received the sentence he deserved'; but he saw that there might be 'no greater tyrant in the world than an assembly', and that it was of 'the first importance that it should understand its constitutional rights'.¹

¹ Bédard to J. Neilson, May 1 and June 20, 1819, Neilson MSS. (Canadian Archives).

The coming storm broke over the head of Lord Dalhousie, who acted as governor for over eight years. He was instructed to secure 'the permanent assignment of a fixed annual revenue to meet the charge of such a civil list as the province requires for its proper administration'.¹ When he met the legislature in December 1820, he presented a statement of the costs of government and he asked the assembly to provide sufficiently and permanently for them. The assembly missed the careful hands of Prevost and Sherbrooke. The estimates, remodelled and changed, were voted for a year, and the crown revenues were included as under provincial control. The council rejected the bill and censured the assembly, but the executive was left financially helpless. A year later Dalhousie explained with infinite patience that permanent provision was merely asked for permanent expenditure and that the general expenditure could be covered by a yearly vote. A motion for a civil list was overwhelmingly defeated. The assembly aired their views in an address to the king, proceeded to appoint a member of the house of commons as provincial agent in London, and threatened not to renew certain expiring revenue acts. The latter course would have further thwarted the executive, and in addition would have hurt Upper Canada, which depended for financial assistance on a share of customs' duties at Lower Canadian ports.² To grant the claims of the assembly meant that the constitution would be upset at the bidding of one colonial house. The assembly might become supreme in Lower Canada and hold up the entire government or render it dependent on imperial funds dubiously applied. In addition, Upper Canada, already irritable under the injustices of the financial arrangements between the two provinces, would be materially injured by constitutional issues which did not concern it. It was obvious that conciliation must give place to some method of government more productive of administrative efficiency in the one province and of justice towards the other.

¹ Bathurst to Dalhousie, September 11, 1820, Colonial Office Papers, G. 11 (Canadian Archives).

² Dalhousie to Bathurst, January 25 and June 10, 1822, State Papers, Q. 161, pp. 50, 218.

In June 1822 the under secretary for the colonies introduced a bill into the house of commons which embodied a change of policy. The two provinces were to be united under one legislature, each division having sixty members in a new assembly independent of population. A high property franchise was proposed which would have disfranchised most of the habitants. After fifteen years, French was to disappear as a parliamentary language and the Roman catholic church was to be brought under the Act of supremacy as previously suggested by Craig and Ryland.¹ The measure was postponed until Canadian opinion had been sounded, but its financial clauses were passed as the Canada Trade Act,² by which the legislature of Lower Canada was restrained from legislating about the customs' duties in such a way as to hurt the upper province.

Quite apart from the fact that the British parliament interfered with the taxing powers of the local assembly, the Act was such a bare-faced attack on the French-Canadian party that Papineau and John Neilson had no difficulty in organizing opposition. Politically the measure meant subordination if not absorption, ecclesiastically it alienated the priesthood, and seigniors and habitants alike were scared at clauses which threatened the traditional land system. In Upper Canada opinion was divided. Dr. Strachan and Beverley Robinson led a strong opposition, and the only consistent backing came from the Eastern Townships.³ Papineau and Neilson easily convinced the British cabinet of the folly of the measure, and meanwhile the house of assembly watched events in comparative quiet. No sooner was the bill withdrawn, than it presented

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 307 ff.

² 3 Geo. IV, c. 119.

³ See the petitions for and against the union of the provinces in Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 318 ff.

another scene. The immediate danger was over, but Papineau now possessed a political party, and with indecent violence he attacked Dalhousie as the living embodiment of the anglicizing policy. He led the assembly into another financial impasse by proposals which included the reduction of the governor's salary. Dalhousie could only close the session in despair, and point out how unconstitutional claims were not only hurting the province but handing on the seeds of certain destruction to each succeeding parliament.¹ During Dalhousie's absence in England the lieutenant-governor, Sir Francis Burton, acting in ignorance of instructions, and anxious to nullify such a gloomy view, presented the estimates as a whole and made no distinction between permanent and local revenues. He pointed out the estimated deficit and asked for a vote. The assembly examined the entire revenue, made considerable reductions in the appropriations, and voted what they considered adequate for a year. Burton reported a quiet session and thought that financial difficulties could now be settled between the two houses.² The assembly interpreted their 'quietest session for twenty-five years' as one in which they had established constitutional control over the purse. Burton was severely censured.³ When Dalhousie returned to the old method of distinguishing charges against the permanent revenue from charges against the casual revenue, he was met with challenging resolutions by the assembly: 'to the legislature alone appertains the right of distributing all monies levied in the colonies.'⁴ He prorogued parliament in a speech of dignified regret, and in one memorable sentence he concisely summed up the constitutional issue: 'I have seen . . . in this session a positive assumption of executive authority instead of that of legislative, which last is alone your share in the constitution of the state.'⁵ The electors refused to

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 338 ff.

² Burton to Bathurst, March 24, 1825, State Papers, Q. 171, p. 12.

³ Bathurst to Burton, June 4, 1825, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 339 ff.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 340 ff.

⁵ Ibid., pp. 341 ff.

accept the challenge of Dalhousie's speech, and Papineau swept the country. During the campaign he lavished such personal abuse on the governor that Dalhousie refused to accept him as a speaker.

The dreary petitions and counter petitions chased one another across the ocean to the colonial office. Dalhousie was finally removed to India, and a committee of the house of commons was appointed to consider the civil government of Canada.¹ The report confirmed the Canadians of French extraction in the enjoyment of their religion, laws, and privileges. It recommended a redistribution bill 'on a compound basis of territory and population'. While acknowledging the crown's right over certain revenues, the opinion was given 'that the real interests of the province would be best promoted by placing the receipt and expenditure of the whole public revenue under the superintendence and control of the house of assembly'. The governor, members of the executive council, and judges should be rendered independent of annual votes, and all revenues except territorial and hereditary should be handed over to the representative body. The legislative councils should be improved by withdrawing from them such a numerous group of office-holders. The entire reform was pronounced possible under 'an impartial, conciliatory, and constitutional system of government', in which the legislative assembly and the executive government would be placed 'on a right footing'. The report was never debated and the 'system' and the 'footing' remained an unsolved mystery.

An attempt was made to conciliate. The secretary for the colonies pointed out that while the imperial statutes were unrepealed, the revenues under them could not be surrendered; but that after the salaries had been paid to the governor and judges, the balance would not be appropriated until the assembly had been given an opportunity of discussing the best means of using it in the interests of the province. The financial concerns of Lower Canada would be settled by legislation. Shortly after this conciliatory dispatch, he introduced a bill, which was not passed, to hand over the revenue collected under the Quebec Revenue Act in return for a civil list. The result was ominous. The assembly replied in a series of resolutions claiming an inherent and constitutional right to control the whole public revenue, and repudiating the jurisdiction of the imperial parliament in the matter. A permanent settlement with the consent of the assembly alone would produce a civil list.¹ The report was received as 'an imperishable monument of justice and profound wisdom', but there was no disposition to work towards it. The Eastern Townships, however, at long last received eight representatives under a new distribution bill.

¹ The report is in British Parliamentary Papers, 1828, vii. 569. The evidence is of exceptional value. The most important constitutional sections are in Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 345 ff.

When Lord Aylmer took over the government, he was instructed to continue the policy of conciliation and to neglect the implied impasse of the resolutions. He offered to hand over the provincial revenues, except from casual and territorial funds, in return for a civil list. The assembly was now on a very high horse. The civil list was refused. The debates contained newer and more extreme notes, such as a proposal to abolish the legislative council, to refuse all subsidies, and to repeal the constitution of 1791. Finally an address of grievances was drawn up, which Aylmer received with the implied sarcasm, 'Is this all?' Meanwhile the imperial government were busy on further concessions. They were willing to make the judges independent and to exclude them from the executive and legislative councils, excepting the chief justice, in return for permanent salaries. Practically a complete surrender was made to all the assembly's demands. In 1831 a law was passed handing over unconditionally the crown revenues under the Quebec Revenue Act.²

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 351 ff.

² Ibid., pp. 356 ff. (1 & 2 William IV, c. 23).

The spirit of the assembly remained the same. The imperial authorities asked for a bill securing the independence of the judges, guaranteeing their salaries, and providing a small civil list for the governor and a few officials. A bill was passed making the judges independent, but on an annual salary, and the civil list was rejected. The imperial government curtly disallowed the bill, and informed the assembly that the civil list outside the judicial salaries would be met from other sources. Papineau was leading his followers to a dizzy height of fatuity. When a few French-Canadians were killed by soldiers in an election riot at Montreal he cried out in the assembly, 'Craig only imprisoned his victims, Aylmer slaughters them'. Public meetings on racial lines fanned the political flames and folly added another triumph to the cause, when during an outbreak of cholera Aylmer was accused of having 'enticed the sick emigrants into the country in order to decimate the ranks of the French-Canadians'. Debates on countless wrongs transformed the assembly into a dangerous institution. The king was petitioned to allow the summoning of a 'general assembly' of the people analogous to those in the United States, and to make the legislative council elective.¹ On its side, the legislative council opposed these suggestions and set out a justification for its existence that through it alone could the British element in the province receive security. Any changes in the constitution such as those suggested by the assembly would only result in civil war between the provinces and would 'drench the country with blood'.² Aylmer transmitted replies. The threat of war was severely rebuked. An elective legislative council was 'inconsistent with the very existence of monarchical institutions', and if changes must come in the constitution they might be of a nature little likely to appeal to the popular party.³

The assembly girded its loins for one supreme effort, and on February 17, 1834, Elzéar Bédard, Pierre Bédard's son, introduced the famous Ninety-Two Resolutions,¹ commonly assigned to the pen of Auguste Norbert Morin, who afterwards held ministerial office. These resolutions represented the extreme of constitutional demands in a framework of doctrinaire theory and implied revolution. They were the Grand Remonstrance, the Declaration of Right of the party which Papineau now completely controlled, and were described, probably by John Neilson: 'eleven stood true; six contained both truth and falsehood; sixteen stood wholly false; seventeen stood doubtful; twelve were ridiculous; seven were repetitions; fourteen consisted only of abuse; four were false and seditious; and five were good or indifferent.'²

¹ Ibid., pp. 358 ff.

² Ibid., pp. 362 ff.

³ Ibid., pp. 364 ff.

The description may stand. The framework, however, discounted real grievances. The home government did not care to be told that toryism was dead in America, which prospered under widespread republicanism, and that the United States flourished under free institutions, whereas British North America stagnated under autocracy. Nor was there ordinary common sense in reminding Great Britain of the American revolution, or in suggesting that if grievances were not redressed only two alternatives remained for the province—either 'of submitting to an ignominious bondage or of severing those ties endangered which unite [it] to the mother country'. Insistence on 'conventions of the people' and on an elective second chamber did not gain much support with a British cabinet from being linked up with examples from 'our neighbours', who understood 'the manners and social state of the inhabitants of this continent'. The solemn impeachment of 'his excellency Matthew, Lord Aylmer of Balrath . . . for his illegal, unjust and unconstitutional administration of the government', in addition to its impudence, was too much like cabinet government in the hands of a colonial assembly, even though it was 'the grand inquest of the province'.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 366 ff.

² Aylmer to Stanley, May 1, 1834, State Papers, Q. 216-2, p. 283.

On the other hand, they were attacks on genuine evils. The legislative council was the creature of the executive council and it had become 'inevitably the servile tool of the authority which creates, composes, and decomposes it'. The judges were not above suspicion; pluralities among officials were common; the expenditure of public money without popular consent was at least dangerous and volcanic. There was unfortunately little constructive suggestion, outside that of the application of the elective principle to the legislative council. There was not a hint of responsible government unless it was implied in Aylmer's impeachment and in vague phrase 'the vicious composition and the irresponsibility of the executive council'. Perhaps the most interesting results of the Resolutions were undreamed of by their authors. They proclaimed the parting of the ways. The saner men, such as John Neilson, Augustin Cuvillier, F. A. Quesnel, and Andrew Stuart, broke away from Papineau's leadership. Even Elzéar Bédard found a place for repentance. The church stiffened its back against the sentiments of democracy, revolution, and republicanism. The deserters, if such they were, did not turn tory and reactionary. They lent weight to societies for constitutional reform. It would be far from judicial to represent the 'patriotes' as the only reformers. The 'constitutionalists' saw much that demanded change. The judicature and the irresponsible land-granting department needed revision. The accumulation of offices in the hands of the families and friends of legislative councillors was held up for reprehension. The executive council was inefficient and had feeble claims on the confidence of the community. The colonial office was incapable of handling the affairs of the colony.¹ The last complaint at this period became common, and it was unfortunately made clearer at the moment when Stanley, afterwards earl of Derby, allowed himself to propose a select committee of the house of commons to inquire into conditions in Lower Canada. This committee could offer no better advice than an expression of its duty to withhold any opinion on the points in dispute, and of its persuasion 'that the practical measures for the future administration of Lower Canada may best be left to the mature consideration of the government responsible for their adoption and execution'.¹

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 388 ff.

The ascent from folly to tragedy now began. Papineau gained strength at the elections of 1835, and supplies were cut off. Expenses were met by borrowings from the military chest, a move which the assembly described as 'destroying the wholesome and constitutional influence which the people ought to have through their representatives over every branch of the executive government'. The constitution was apparently paralysed. The imperial government recalled Aylmer and sent out a royal commission, consisting of the earl of Gosford as governor—a good-natured and innocuous Irishman,—Sir George Gipps, an eighteenth-century whig, and Sir Charles Grey, a retired Indian judge, a typical tory and the reputed nominee of William IV. This commission was supposed to handle with constructive insight demands covering a complete surrender of all public revenue, an elective second chamber, a reorganized executive, and the abandonment of the system of chartered companies in settlement as the advance guards of a subtle process of anglicization.

The colonial secretary, Lord Glenelg, issued Gosford's instructions.² The inexperienced Irishman was impressed in high sounding terms with the nobility and pregnant purpose of his mission, and was told to report his 'matured sentiments' on provincial affairs. He was above all to bear in mind that he was sent on a 'mission of peace and conciliation'. The instructions were a strange compound of giving with one hand and taking away with another. To the hoary demand for control of all the revenue and the equally old refusal of a civil list, there was no solution offered. The crown was prepared to hand over all sources of income for an adequate civil list, for the management of the waste lands, and for pensions for retired officials. The constitution of 1791 was relied on. To debate salaries annually would establish the recognition of a principle that offices and officials were open to revision by the assembly. On the other hand, the king actually thought an elective legislative council might be considered, 'because his majesty [was] not prepared to deny that a statute which has been in effective operation for something less than forty-three years [might] not be capable of improvement'. Every schoolboy knows that William IV objected on 'sound constitutional principle to the adoption of the elective principle in the constitution of the legislative councils of the colonies'. Indeed, the concession made to the idea of constitutional change was virtually withdrawn in succeeding sections of the instructions.

¹ The report is in British Parliamentary Papers, 1834, vol. xviii, p. 449.

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 399.

Gosford thus began with a willing spirit, but the flesh was weak. His first assembly dragged on a dreary session until Papineau learned from Marshall Bidwell of Upper Canada that Gosford had not given the real substance of his instructions in his opening speech. This seemed to differ from the verbatim extracts quoted from the commissioners' instructions by Sir Francis Bond Head to the legislature of Upper Canada. At once the old noise of battle broke out. The legislative council refused to accept a supply bill different from that proposed by the government, and the legislature was prorogued, leaving the government without legal revenue for the fourth year to carry on the administration. Prorogation did not take place, however, until the assembly once more placed on record its demand for an elective legislative council. In dealing with the executive council it comes as near as the French-Canadian party ever came to responsible government: 'on the subject of the executive council we abstain from entering on any details because we hold this question to be closely connected in practice with the other more important subjects of colonial policy. We shall confine ourselves in saying that the full and entire recognition of the rights of this house and of the people by those whom your majesty may be pleased to call to your councils, and their constitutional responsibility based on the practice of the United Kingdom, will be essential motives for confidence in your majesty's government.'¹

Under the shadow of inevitable failure the commissioners presented six reports.² The most important recommendations were that the imperial Act of 1831 be repealed,³ and that no responsibility of the executive council to the legislature be recognized. The British cabinet were unwilling to repeal the statute. Gosford laid all his instructions before the legislature which he summoned on September 22, 1836. There was no progress. 'Colonial degradation' and 'metropolitan ascendancy' were the notes; but there was a clear-cut resolution which must be quoted at length, as it is at once the most constructive constitutional statement in the tantalizing history: 'The principal object of those reforms is:—To render the executive council of this province directly responsible to the representatives of the people, in conformity with the principles and practice of the British constitution as they obtain in the United Kingdom; to extend the principle of election to the legislative council, which branch of the provincial legislature has hitherto proved, by reason of its independence of the people, and of its imperfect and vicious constitution, insufficient to perform the functions for which it was originally designed; to place under the constitutional and salutary control of this house the whole of the revenues levied in this province from whatever source arising; to abolish pluralities or the cumula-

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 421 ff.

² Reports are in British Parliamentary Papers, 1837, vol. xxiv, p. 50.

³ See above, p. 106.

tion in one person of several or incompatible offices ; to procure the repeal of certain statutes passed by the imperial parliament in which the people of this province are not and cannot be represented, which Acts are an infringement of the rights and privileges of the legislature of this colony and are injurious to the interests of the people thereof ; to obtain over the internal affairs of this province and over the management and settlement of the wild lands thereof (for the advantage and benefit of all classes of his majesty's subjects therein without distinction) that wholesome and necessary control which springs from the principles of the constitution itself, and of right belongs to the legislature and more particularly to this house as the representatives of the people ; which reforms are specially calculated to promote the happiness of his majesty's subjects in this province, to draw more close the ties which attach the colony to the British empire, and can in no way prejudice or injure the interests of any of the sister provinces.'¹

The British government was at its wits' end. Lower Canada received special mention in the king's message to parliament in January 1837, and on March 6 Lord John Russell introduced ten resolutions² which were passed in the face of some keen radical opposition. They empowered the governor-general to use monies in the hands of the receiver-general to pay arrears of salaries. They refused an elective legislative council, the introduction of executive responsibility, and the cancellation of the North American Land Company's charter. They promised legislation on land tenure in conformity with a suitable local Act, and complete control of revenue in return for permanent judicial salaries and a civil list. They authorized the Canadian legislatures to adjust trade disputes between the two provinces. Steps were taken to give the resolutions the force of law by legislation. Gosford was instructed meanwhile to call the legislature of Lower Canada and to give it, as it were, a last chance. The king's death and the accession of Queen Victoria stayed legislation, and the government of Lower Canada was temporarily provided for by a vote of credit.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., p. 426.

² Ibid., pp. 434 ff.

In the province the ten resolutions fanned the embers of nationalism into a glowing heat. They were denounced as 'violations of the social contract' and as 'foul stains'. On all sides meetings of protest were held and the 'cap of liberty' was set up in scenes of flamboyant enthusiasm. 'Papineau et le système électif', 'Papineau et l'indépendance', 'A bas le despotisme' were the shouts and devices of new revolutionaries. Gosford's legislature of August 1837 was merely a more respectable edition of what was going on outside its walls. It was pure waste of time to submit to it the ten resolutions, and to hold them aloft as a veiled threat was pure folly.¹ The reply was ominous. 'It is our duty', said the assembly, 'to tell the mother country that if she carries the spirit of these resolutions into effect in the government of British America, and of this province in particular, her supremacy therein will no longer depend upon the feelings of affection, of duty, and of mutual interest which would best secure it, but on physical and material force.'² On August 26 Gosford prorogued the legislature, and, as events turned out, the legislature of Lower Canada never reassembled. A few days later he informed the colonial secretary that it might be necessary to suspend the constitution.³

In November the first shots were fired in a tragedy of civil war, and the first lives were sacrificed in Canada for a political ideal. The church saved the situation, and Bishop Lartigue of Montreal in a noble pastoral rallied the rank and file of the clergy and people to the cause of peace.⁴ It is impossible to

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 436 ff.

² Ibid., pp. 438 ff. The ten resolutions did not pass unchallenged in Upper Canada and the legislative council of that province submitted them to severe criticism: Journals of Legislative Council, February 13, 1838.

³ Gosford to Glenelg, September 2, 1837, State Papers, Q. 238-1-2, p. 71.

⁴ Same to same, October 30, 1837, ibid., p. 403.

reconstruct those pathetic and ephemeral scenes of foolhardy devotion amid the first snows of a Canadian winter without something of pity for idealists deserted by their leaders and something of shame for conditions that made civil war possible. To rebel was unreasonable ; but failure covers a multitude of sins. On January 16, 1838, Lord John Russell introduced a bill which after amendment and recasting was passed on February 10 as ' An Act to make temporary provision for the government of Lower Canada '.¹ The constitution of 1791 was suspended from the date of the proclamation of the Act to November 1, 1840. The crown was given power to constitute a special council, by authorizing the governor to summon special councillors. The laws passed by this council were limited in operation to November 1, 1842, ' unless continued by competent authority '. The council could impose no new taxes and could make no constitutional changes. The governor alone could introduce a law, and five councillors must be present to give it legal force. The Act was the creation of a dictatorship which, Lord John Russell announced, was to be conferred on Lord Durham. Meanwhile the Act was sent to Sir John Colborne, and he was instructed to summon a special council for temporary needs, leaving Durham free to form his own. Colborne's council consisted of twenty-one members, of whom eleven were French-Canadians. On April 18 the council met and was prorogued on May 5, 1838.

[AUTHORITIES.—The documentary material is in A. G. Doughty and D. A. McArthur, Documents relating to the Constitutional History of Canada, 1791-1818 (Ottawa, 1914) ; Egerton and Grant, Canadian Constitutional Development (Toronto, 1907) ; Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759-1915 (Oxford, 1918) ; the State Papers, Q. 60-Q. 241 (Canadian Archives) ; the Neilson MSS. (Canadian Archives) ; R. Christie, A History of the Late Province of Lower Canada (6 vols., Montreal, 1866) ; the Minutes of the Legislative Council of Lower Canada ; Journals of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada. Lord Durham, Report on the Affairs of British North America (ed. Sir Charles Lucas, 3 vols., Oxford, 1912), is an essential book for the period, and Sir Charles Lucas's introduction is invaluable. N. E. Dionne, 'Pierre Bédard et ses Fils' (Galerie Historique, i, Quebec, 1909), and 'Les Trois Comédies du "Statu Quo" 1834' (Galerie Historique, ii, Quebec, 1909) are useful. The preface to the latter is of the greatest value in connexion with the split in 1834. Dr. Dionne also prints the 'Ninety-two Resolutions' with a very valuable commentary. E. Cruikshank, 'The Administration of Sir James Craig; A Chapter in Canadian History' (Transactions of the Royal Society of Canada, 3rd series, vol. ii, sect. ii, pp. 61 ff.), is based on contemporary material. F. X. Garneau, Histoire du Canada (cinquième édition, Paris, 1913-20), gives the history from the French-Canadian point of view. A good general introduction with a short bibliography is A. D. DeCelles, The 'Patriotes' of '37 (Toronto, 1915). The period from 1791 to 1812 is fully discussed in Thomas Chapais, Cours d'histoire du Canada (vol. ii, Montreal, 1921). The British Parliamentary Papers contain much valuable material, among which may be noted specially—The Report of the Select Committee on the State of the Civil Government of Canada (1828, vii. 569); Fourth Report of the Standing Committee of Grievances on Lord Aylmer's Conduct as Governor (1836, xxxix. 570); Report of Commissioners on the Grievances complained of in Lower Canada (1837, xxiv. 50); Evidence before Select Committee on Lower Canada in 1834 (1837, vii. 96); and Report of same (1834, xviii. 449).]

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 445 ff. (1 & 2 Victoria, c. 9).

116 REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT, 1792-1838

CHAPTER X

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN UPPER CANADA, 1792-1838

THE constitution of 1791 could hardly have found a more ideal foster-father than Lieutenant-Colonel John Graves Simcoe, first lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada. He was a soldier, an aristocrat, a strong believer in the established church and in that due gradation of social life so dear to his class. To him the British constitution was only less sacred than the bible, and it was almost with reverence that he undertook the work of organizing the government of the new province. On September 17, 1792, he opened the first legislature at Newark. The scene has passed into the romance of Canadian history. All available pomp of circumstance was pressed into service, and in a clearing in the Canadian woods an attempt was made to reproduce with solemn seriousness and due decorum the glory of Westminster. The one regret in Simcoe's eyes was that so many members of the house of assembly were 'one-table men'—dined in common with their servants—and did not belong to what he considered the best class in the province.

The scene, however, is more than a romance. It is an index to Upper Canadian life. Founded on an aversion to republicanism and on loyalty to monarchical principles, Simcoe laid very permanent foundations for Upper Canada. The governor was to be a real viceroy, the legislative council a western house of lords, the legislative assembly a gracious cog in the political machine. The Anglican church was to shed the kindly influence of its decent and established moderation in balancing society and in eliminating such zealots as the Methodists, 'a set of ignorant enthusiasts, whose preaching [was] calculated to perplex the understanding, to corrupt the morals, to relax the nerves of industry and to dissolve the bands of society'. The toleration given to the Roman catholic church was due to Simcoe's recognition that its priests were 'interested in a connexion with the authority of thrones, and who therefore never lose sight of the principle to preserve and propagate arbitrary power'.¹

The province was at once organized along British lines. English civil law and trial by jury were introduced and the foundations of local representative government were laid.² Local taxation was regulated. Arrangements were made to pay members of the house of assembly and to define their qualifications. A judicial system was set up and a criminal law thoroughly established.³ Simcoe, however, would have reproduced the entire English system. He incorporated towns on the British model and he created county lieutenants.⁴ Even the home government was persuaded to give a doubtful sanction to his schemes.⁵ His ruling passion was to stem the tide of 'democratic subversion . . . to establish the form as well as the spirit of the British constitution by modelling all the minutest branches of the executive government after a similar system, and by aiming as far as possible to turn the views of his majesty's subjects from any attention to the various modes and customs of the several provinces from which they emigrated to the contemplation of Great Britain itself as the sole and primary object of general and particular imitation'.⁶ He was little pleased when Portland pointed out how colonial circumstances might be detrimental to such slavish adherence to British models and precedents, and especially how it might weaken

¹ La Rochefoucault-Liancourt, Travels in Canada, 1795, pp. 47 ff. (edited W. R. Riddell, Ontario Archives, Toronto, 1917).

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 227 ff.

³ Doughty and McArthur, op. cit., pp. 91, 146, 158, 194, 246.

⁴ Simcoe to Portland, December 21, 1794, ibid., pp. 196 ff.

⁵ Portland to Simcoe, May 20, 1795, ibid., pp. 204 ff.

⁶ Simcoe to Portland, January 22, 1795, ibid., pp. 200 ff.

the hands of the governor himself. Simcoe disputed the implied censure and his political faith survived the shock of dispatches. He informed the cabinet that his zeal was necessary to check 'the elective principle' on the continent, and that he rejoiced in an ideal legislative council which saved him refusing many bills from a 'tenacious and untractable' house of assembly.¹ There may have been personal pique when he resented what he considered Dorchester's interference in the affairs of the province, but his devotion to the constitution undoubtedly was the moving force in his protests.

Outside the actual machinery of government it is necessary to reconstruct something of the social background against which this 'British senator soldier' administered no 'mutilated constitution', but one that was 'the very image and transcript of that of Great Britain, by which she has long established and secured to her subjects as much freedom and happiness as is possible to be enjoyed under the subordination necessary to civilized society'.² First were the military, who took their cue from the lieutenant-governor and out-heroded Herod in being British. Then came the original United Empire loyalists, who had earliest shaken off the republican dust from their feet, and soon created a rustic aristocracy with almost complete control of the councils. Then there were the regular immigrants from the United States, whose devotion to republicanism was not superior to a love for good Canadian farm-lands. This group was looked down on by the true loyalist, who had come out of Egypt with clean heart and unsoiled hands. Lastly, there was a growing population of British settlers, who were in turn despised as foreigners and emigrants by those who now claimed a monopoly in the British name.

With Simcoe at the head of affairs, Upper Canada inevitably

¹ Same to same, October 30, 1795, ibid., pp. 206 ff.

² Simcoe to legislature, October 15, 1792, Journals of Legislative Assembly of Upper Canada, p. 18 (Ontario Archives, Toronto, 1909).

began its life with some sort of a governing class, and it was not many years before a local oligarchy or clique, known to history as 'the family compact', practically controlled the situation. No one seriously doubts their general ability and their general good intentions, qualities which as a rule lay behind their power. But too frequently their caprice, interest, arrogance, and folly stand out in the history in such a way as to make it impossible for criticism to bow the head silently before the shrine of loyalty. It is the impact of this group on the stern pioneer reality of a new world that created the constitutional issues in Upper Canada. It widened its borders by including noble and baseborn, Anglican and Methodist, the good, the bad, the indifferent; and by a process now lost to minute investigation it gained executive control. It lined the frontier, while dubious settlers were located deeper in the forest. York, Newark, and Kingston reflected its life. Peter Russell, the administrator till the arrival of General Hunter as lieutenant-governor, began to build up its fortunes or at least its property qualifications in huge land grants. Secure behind an Alien Act passed in 1804, which gave the government power to arrest and deport those of suspected loyalty who had not resided six months in the province, Upper Canada might look forward to the reproduction in America of the British constitution and the British class-system. The crown lands were ready for decent speculation, and land never tainted the hands as trade did. The clergy reserves were the symbol in every township of that combination of church and state so eminently respectable and revered.

Unfortunately for the dawn of another England, a group of reformers early entered the scenes of ordered peace.¹ In ¹ The documents connected with these early reformers are printed in extenso in Report of the Canadian Archives, 1892, pp. 33 ff. (Ottawa, 1893). There are several letters from C. B. Wyatt over his case in Baldwin MSS. [A], E. 6-7, pks. 17-24 (Ontario Archives). See also W. R. Riddell, 'Mr. Justice Thorpe' (Canadian Law Times, November 1920. pp. 907 ff.).

February 1805 William Weekes, an Irish barrister, was elected to the house of assembly. Almost immediately he introduced a motion 'that it is expedient for this house to enter into the consideration of the disquietude which prevails in the province by reason of the administration of public offices'.¹ He could only rally four votes to his side. A year later he returned to the attack. The government had passed on Hunter's death into the hands of Alexander Grant, 'pitchforked into power by a clique'. Weekes found the executive insecure, and succeeded in having a committee appointed, with power to call witnesses, to consider the state of the province.² It reported against the arbitrary methods in land granting, against the wretched roads throughout the country, and the lack of general education.³ The resolutions were not momentous, but Weekes continued his unwelcome interest in affairs. He took up the cause of 'Methodists, Quakers, Mennonists, and Tunkers'.⁴ He was largely responsible for the discovery that a considerable sum of money had been paid out of the provincial treasury without the authority of parliament or a vote of the assembly. A committee of the house reported that its rights and privileges had been violated, and Weekes drew up the address to the administrator lamenting the departure from 'constituted authority and fiscal establishment' as painful to a free people and their representatives, and expressing a hope that he would 'more than sympathize in so extraordinary an occurrence'. Grant replied that he regretted the dissatisfaction, and could only plead custom as the executive's excuse. He promised, however, an 'immediate investigation'.⁵ His reply was referred, on Weekes's motion, to a committee of the whole house, which reported having passed

¹ Journals of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada (March 1, 1805), p. 48 (Ontario Archives, Toronto, 1911).

² Ibid. (February 10, 1806), p. 64.

³ Ibid. (February 12, 1806), pp. 67 ff.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 72 ff.

⁵ Ibid. (February 28, March 1, 1806), pp. 101 ff., 107. See also Doughty and McArthur, op. cit., pp. 318 ff.

a resolution ; but the assembly, on the speaker's vote, refused to receive a report.¹ The legislature was prorogued the same day and the matter dropped. In writing to the British government, however, Grant took an opportunity to regret the 'intemperate address', and laid it at the door of those who endeavoured 'to perplex, if not to distress the administration', by influencing members 'sequestered from the world' and without 'the benefit of a liberal education'. When the lieutenant-governor, Francis Gore, came to the province in August 1806, he returned the money in dispute to the provincial treasury. The assembly expressed its 'full satisfaction' and the house passed a resolution relinquishing its claim to the appropriation.² In the minority of two against the resolution appeared the name of Robert Thorpe, of whom Gore, in announcing the resolution to the colonial office, said 'he has uniformly opposed every measure that could promote the peace or strengthen the hands of this government'.

Robert Thorpe was another Irishman who was appointed judge of the king's bench for Upper Canada in July 1805, after an unfortunate three years in Prince Edward Island. His attitude towards public affairs can be estimated by the fact that within five months he thought himself competent to write to the home government a report on the province: 'I find that Governor Hunter has nearly ruined this province; his whole system was rapaciousness, to accumulate money by grants of land was all he thought of . . . unjust and arbitrary, he dissatisfied the people and oppressed the officers of government. He had a few Scotch instruments about him . . . that he made subservient to his purpose, and by every other individual he and his tools were execrated. Nothing has been done for the colony. No roads; bad water communication; no post; no religion ; no morals ; no education ; no trade ; no agriculture ; no industry attended to.' Thorpe felt that his special care should be directed towards conciliating the people, and he tried to lead the assembly, though as yet not a member of it, in the direction of popular rights against ' extortion and oppression '. His correspondence at this time leaves the impression that he considered it his duty to take care of the province. ' I will labour to keep everything quiet at least till the governor comes.' His method was extraordinary. He made ' the courts of justice the theatres for political harangues ' and his charges to juries occasions for his quieting labours. He received addresses from them in which he was recognized as a channel for the communication of grievances. ' I shall lay before the governor everything you desire, . . . may [he be] Promethean heat and animate the province from the centre to the extremity.' The new lieutenant-governor, Francis Gore, arrived while Thorpe was on circuit. He had thus an opportunity to hear of Thorpe's strange doings from the executive council, and was not at all friendly when he interviewed him for the first time.

¹ Journals of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada (March 3, 1806), pp. 113 ff. (Ontario Archives, Toronto, 1911).

² Ibid., pp. 122, 125, 174-5.

Thorpe was destined for further notoriety. William Weekes, while engaged in a case before Thorpe at Niagara assizes, took occasion to deliver a kind of political speech in which he described General Hunter as a ' gothic barbarian whom the providence of God had removed from this world for his tyranny and iniquity '. Thorpe sat ' with the greatest composure to hear this abuse '. One of the council in the case ' warmly reprobated such language ' and as a consequence received a challenge from Weekes, who fell mortally wounded in a subsequent duel. Public rumour claimed that Thorpe was not only a party to the speech, but instigated the unfortunate tragedy, after passing a night with Weekes at a public tavern. At any rate, Weekes's death created a vacancy in the house of assembly and Thorpe was asked to contest the seat, an invitation which he at once accepted. Gore tried to dissuade him, by pointing out 'the impropriety of a judge becoming a candidate for a seat in a popular assembly', but Thorpe replied that his office was no constitutional disqualification, and the assembly later supported him in a resolution of the house.¹ He went to the opening of the poll 'invoking the shade of his departed friend as looking down from heaven with pleasure on their exertions in the cause of liberty'. Every effort was made to elect a strong government candidate. Thorpe maintained that the lieutenant-governor, with his 'Scotch pedlars' and 'shopkeeper aristocracy', used 'every species of undue influence, bribery, coercion, and oppression . . . and himself demeaned by trying to seduce both high and low'. Gore replied by accusing Thorpe of marching to victory under an Irish rebel flag, and amid unblushing references to the American revolution and to Charles I.

Thorpe's return was an occasion for repression. Gore attacked the freedom of the press, and closed the columns of the Upper Canada Gazette by order, when Thorpe sought to answer a challenge from his late opponent which had appeared in that journal. In addition, the lieutenant-governor attacked and dismissed some officials who had supported Thorpe, notably the surveyor-general, C. B. Wyatt, and the sheriff of the home district, Joseph Willcocks. It is doubtless true that both these men were out of sympathy with the government, and equally true that as officials they might have been less prominent in a political fray. Wyatt was too loose-tongued in his hope that after Thorpe's election 'the government would go to the devil'; but Gore went out of his way to invent or to create charges of incompetency and fraud against him, which Wyatt, who left for England, finally disproved.² Against Willcocks the record of a convivial evening at the house of John Mills Jackson was alone brought as evidence. 'Push the bottle about' was the standing command, and before long Willcocks was damning the governor and government and the 'Scotch faction', while Jackson urged him on as having been treated by Gore as 'a damned rascal'. Later on Jackson had the question of Canadian government brought up in the house of commons, but the pamphlet¹ which he published on the political state of Upper Canada was too strong for the house of assembly, which passed a unanimous resolution describing it as a libel full of 'unexampled insolence and contumely'.² Jackson's propaganda was intended to help the parliamentary debate in London,³ and the censure may have been due to Gore's efforts to provide Castlereagh with counter-material.⁴ At any rate, Gore was under suspicion during the period. Willcocks, who had founded a newspaper, charged his fellow members with being in the pay of the government, and implied that he had information. At Gore's instigation apparently prosecution for libel was dropped. Willcocks, however, threw discretion to the winds and was imprisoned by order of the speaker till the end of the session.⁵ During 1812 he obstructed the war policy of the government, and finally was killed fighting on the American side at the siege of Fort Erie.

¹ Journals of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada (February 9, 10, 1806), pp. 127 ff., 135.

² Annual Register, vol. lviii, p. 294.

It is somewhat difficult to form an estimate of this group who later were looked back on as the pioneers of reform. Weekes, Thorpe, Wyatt, and Willcocks were Irishmen, and it may be that jealousy of the 'Scotch pedlars' entered into the history. Willcocks is the easiest judged. His zeal was of a disloyal nature. He was undoubtedly tinged with republicanism six months before he became a member of the legislative assembly, ¹ A View of the Political Situation of the Province of Upper Canada in North America, &c. (London, 1809).

² Journals, &c. (March 10, 1810), p. 369. Cf., however, pp. 370 and 375. Four members, including Willcocks, who entered the assembly on January 1808, opposed the drafting and engrossing of an address to Gore containing the resolution.

³ Jackson to Willcocks, July 19, 1809, State Papers, Q. 313-2, p. 460.

⁴ Gore to Castlereagh, March 11, 1810, ibid., Q. 313-1, p. 245.

⁵ Journals, &c. (February 18, 20, March 16, 1808), pp. 225, 228, 274.

when he was writing to New York expressing his admiration for the government of the United States and his enmity against the British institutions of Upper Canada.¹ Thorpe was fundamentally a blatant demagogue, with a fatal command of words and a conceited and tactless personality. Wyatt and Jackson were a better type, and their opposition was embittered by what they considered rather high-handed methods. Gore possibly inspired the opposition to the group in the assembly, which then, as in the future, was easily moved by the very appearance of sedition and responded to any skilful suggestion of disloyalty. There can be little doubt that Gore's advisers used the fact that most of the reformers were officials against them. Even his attorney-general, William Firth, entered the fray and joined the faction in London demanding his recall. Firth had a caustic pen and could enlarge on the 'tyranny of Mr. Gore and his abandoned iniquitous council' and pour contempt on government circles at York, 'that more than Sodom and Gomorrah of the Western World'.² On the other hand, it must be noted that these men gained the support of some of the sanest citizens of the province, and they cannot lightly be dismissed as mere flotsam and jetsam of political agitation. They were foolish, tactless, impetuous, and filled with a sense of their own importance; and it was a serious error in tactics to oppose the executive, while receiving government pay. Their enthusiasm, however, was genuine, and it was directed to the service of humbler men outside the charmed official circles. Their history is the first chapter in the rebellion. They were the political fathers of more dangerous democrats. The 'Scotch pedlars' became the ultra-loyalists of later days, and Gore set an example of electioneering which other lieutenant-governors followed in after years.

¹ Willcocks to J. and D. Cozens, July 24, 1807, State Papers, Q. 313-2, p. 328.

² Firth to W. W. Baldwin, February 13, 1812, Baldwin MSS. [A], E. 6-7, pk. 20 (Ontario Archives).

The war of 1812 marked a real turning-point in Upper Canadian history. First of all it divided the sheep from the goats—the loyalists who saved the province from the later immigrants from the United States. It lies outside this history to attempt an adequate consideration of this point, but both before and during the war the government kept careful vigilance. ‘Itinerant fanatics enthusiastic in political and religious matters’ had come in from the United States, ‘were cordially received, and thus disseminated their noxious principles.’¹ Brock early noted the number of aliens in the province. Habeas Corpus was suspended and martial law proclaimed. The latter measure caused trouble in the house of assembly, which passed a resolution declaring it ‘arbitrary and unconstitutional’.² The war, however, increased the power of the original United Empire loyalists and their descendants. They and theirs had played the most prominent and most efficient part in it. It had been an imperial war, but such success as had been gained in it was Canadian. It was just the occasion for men of robust convictions and perhaps robuster prejudices. Democrats, itinerant orators, and even good settlers of a later date were insecure in a crisis. As a result, the loyalists after the peace were more loyal and more anti-democratic than ever. Their magnificent devotion intensified their self-confidence and self-esteem. They built up an administrative oligarchy no longer founded merely on the past but on present loyalty. Secondly, there grew out of the war other social dangers which were to react on the constitutional history. There was delay in settling the pay of the militia and much dissatisfaction over the small land grants for military service.³ Many of the rank and file were thus thrown into opposition to the government. American soldiers took back accounts of the splendid lands of Upper

¹ Drummond to Bathurst, April 30, 1814, State Papers, Q. 318-1, p. 81.

² Doughty and McArthur, op. cit., pp. 435 ff.

³ Gore to Bathurst, October 17, 1815, State Papers, Q. 319, p. 117.

Canada, and soon thousands came to conquer with the axe what they had failed to conquer with the sword. At first it was a 'general rush', as Gore described it. Later 'land speculators undertook to settle the province with citizens of the United States'. The assembly joined in the business and refused to tax vacant lands. Gore felt the danger and prorogued the legislature. 'If early attention', he wrote, 'is not paid to compose the spirit arising by the machinations of land speculators in this province, the king's government will be exposed in all future time to purchase tranquillity by the disagreeable measure of stifling sedition by rewards, and thus encouraging the growth of the evil.'¹ Before long American schoolmasters were abroad in the country districts who used books 'tinctured with the principles of their government and constitution and holding up their own worthies as perfect patterns of every moral excellence, whilst our public and private characters are represented in the most odious and disgusting light'.² In addition, the fall of Napoleon brought a crowd of emigrants, many of whom were British radicals and disciples of Cobbett. The new settlers of all classes were largely sectarians with little sympathy for the church of England.

The loyalist oligarchy had gained in personnel. John Strachan, a converted Presbyterian schoolmaster, had become rector of York. In 1815 he was appointed to the executive council, and in 1817 he became a member of the legislative council. Strachan was a fierce fighter, with all the zeal of a convert. His personality was so strong that he soon exercised a powerful influence over the government. Unfortunately he proved a stormy petrel for Upper Canada. He developed into a kind of Anglican Hildebrand. In 1816 his pupil, John Beverley Robinson, became solicitor-general, and later attorney-general. Robinson was a man of narrow views; but brilliant natural gifts and high moral character redeemed him from devious ways. These two were supported by Chief Justice Powell, Henry John Boulton, the solicitor-general, and a group of others, if less known to history, yet none the less self-important. An examination of the civil list of Upper Canada for 1818 discloses the fact that the entire legislative and executive councils were composed of members of the 'family compact', and that all the members of the executive council were also members of the legislative council. The same group also controlled the high court, the law offices, and the militia and surveyor-general's departments.

¹ Gore to Bathurst, April 7, 1817, State Papers, Q. 322, 1-2, p. 129.

² McDonnell to Bathurst, January 16, 1817, ibid., Q. 323, p. 177.

As for the sentiments and affiliations of the house of assembly it is somewhat hard to decide. Their refusal to tax waste lands was not due to any desire to thwart the governing class, but to a rather human weakness which looked for a share in the spoils. On the other hand, their 'rights and privileges' were carefully guarded. They carried on an elaborate dispute with the legislative council over supplies, and asserted that the latter could assent to or reject money bills, but could not amend them. Borrowing the phraseology of 1678, they maintained that they possessed in this matter 'the constitutional and immemorial rights of the commons of Great Britain'. The attitude of the council filled the assembly with 'emotions of the highest interest', for it was 'in [its] essence pregnant with principles subversive of the exercise of the functions of the representative body of the people'. Intercourse between the two houses was broken off. A petition was drawn up affirming the legality of the proceedings and deploring as a national and constitutional evil that legislative and executive functions were vested in the same persons. Samuel Smith, who carried on the government between Gore's departure and the arrival of Sir Peregrine Maitland, closed the session with 'its business unfinished'.¹

¹ Journals of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada (March 12, 19, 21, 23, 24, 26, 27, 30, April 1, 1818), pp. 521 ff. (Ontario Archives, 1912). Cf. Dougherty

A widely distributed pamphlet defended the assembly and sustained them in 'the proud privilege of the people, to keep in their hands the exclusive right to hold the purse-strings'. It deplored the administrator's closing speech: 'but why should we wonder? For, as the fickle goddess turns round the wheel, sometimes a statesman or a warrior is at the head of affairs; and at another a fool, a glutton, or a fly-catcher; for Rome had her Trajans and her Domitians; and in this province, too, we have not been wanting in variety.'¹

Such is the human background. The physical is no less interesting. Surveying had been going on from the first, but with the rush of settlers and the boom in land jobbing it acquired an acceleration in inverse ratio to its accuracy. Before long men were looking for their boundaries and their limits. This state of affairs naturally caused anxiety to the older inhabitants, who began to doubt their surveys. In addition, the constitution of 1791 had imposed on the country physical barriers against wise colonization. In each township there were huge reserves of land set aside for the protestant clergy and for the crown. These, of course, remained undeveloped. With the increase in land speculation, lands were withdrawn from settlers who would gladly have cleared them, and were held idle as the market fluctuated. There was thus created a forest barrier between many a colonist's hut and that of his neighbour. Communications were deplorable and the growth of population was retarded. Whole stretches of country were without roads and bridges, schools and churches.² The constitution sanctioned economic conditions of a serious nature. Real settlers, anxious for the development of the province, were isolated by vast areas of waste lands. Social life was handicapped. Pioneer conditions and McArthur, op. cit., pp. 540 ff., and Smith to Bathurst, April 6, 1818, State Papers, Q. 324-1, p. 51.

¹ Jones Papers, [A], E. 36. 1 (2), May 1818 (n. p.) (Ontario Archives).

² For the method adopted in land granting, see Durham, Report, App. A (ed. Lucas, vol. iii, pp. 1 ff.).

were made harder, and the civilizing effects of community spirit in religion, education, amusement, and everyday intercourse were curtailed. The political aspect of the clergy reserves will appear later.

Among the crowd of new emigrants who came into such a world was Robert Gourlay, a Scotch radical whose most serious defect was lack of social discretion.¹ He was a man of university education and of good family, and had been a member of a commission appointed to inquire into the causes and effects of pauperism in Great Britain. He believed that emigration was the cure for the disease, while at the same time it would help to develop and to populate the colonies. On his arrival in Upper Canada in 1817 he set up as a land agent, and almost instinctively began to formulate plans for organized colonization. Naturally desiring to make his schemes as effective as possible, he issued a list of thirty-one questions to the townships of the province, asking for information which he considered necessary to a serious immigration policy. The sting lay in the last question: 'What in your opinion retards the improvement of your township in particular, or the province in general, and what would most contribute to the same?'² The general impression left by the answers is that crown and clergy reserves, lack of capital, few settlers, and above all an ill-organized land system had combined to hurt the country. No unprejudiced critic could doubt that the facts were so. Unfortunately for Gourlay criticism was the leading deadly sin in Upper Canada. His innocent inquiry took on a political aspect and he found himself a dangerous suspect on the part of the 'family compact' clique. His association with Barnabas Bidwell, an immigrant from Massachusetts, was also against him. The ruling class had an ingrained hatred of Americans, and they dreaded the signs, ¹ The best account of Gourlay is by W. R. Riddell in Ontario Historical Society: Papers and Records, vol. xiv (Toronto, 1916). The author vindicates Chief Justice Powell, who banished Gourlay.

² Gourlay to Torrens, February 7, 1818, State Papers, Q. 150-1, pp. 24, 39.

which were not wanting, that the house of assembly might not be disposed to discriminate against them. Shortly after his arrival Gourlay was counted as a dangerous supporter of the radical element in the assembly, and his proceedings were reported to England as 'inflammatory amongst an ignorant population, from the want of truth, reason, and decorum'.¹ His chief opponent was Strachan; and the 'busy malice of the parson of Little York' found sedition in some of the phrases which Gourlay used in various addresses to the resident land-owners.

Gourlay's offence, however, reached a point too dangerous for the 'family compact' when he issued a call to these proprietors to attend a convention where grievances in general might be discussed and petitions forwarded to England. In due course delegates selected from the various townships met at York. They were a body of entirely respectable men, who had done real work in clearing and settling the province. Resolutions were passed and an address drawn up condemning the entire land-granting system and its evil influence on colonization, and calling on the British parliament to issue a commission of inquiry into the government and affairs of Upper Canada. By this time Gourlay had been unwittingly transformed from an immigration theorist in general into an Upper Canadian 'reformer' in particular. The township meetings were enthusiastic over his 'leadership and genius', and even private correspondence bears witness to the place which he had assumed in popular imagination: 'Times are amazingly dull at Little York. No such thing as cash to be seen. We expect our governor, Mr. Gourlay, from below, soon. He is doing all he can to put our land-granting gentry and big men through their facings, and all I can say for him is good speed his plough.'²

¹ Smith to Bathurst, February 23, 1818, State Papers, Q. 324-1, p. 21.

² Canniff MSS., Case 15 (1818). (Lennox and Addington Historical Society, vol. ix, Napanee, 1917.)

Even the governor-general, Sir John Sherbrooke, reported to England 'the troubled state of things in the upper province'. He forwarded a pamphlet with an account of some of Gourlay's meetings. Only bad health kept him from going to Upper Canada to check the insubordinate spirits.¹ The agitation had taken on a political aspect. Smith, the administrator, had withstood pressure which members of the executive, especially Strachan, had brought to bear on him to prosecute Gourlay. Indeed, Gourlay claimed that Smith and the chief justice had approved his questionnaire. The convention, however, brought matters to a head, and finally Smith agreed that Gourlay should be prosecuted for libel against the administration.

At this point Sir Peregrine Maitland arrived as lieutenant-governor. His military qualities and personal charm emphasized rather than discounted his toryism, and he had little sympathy with 'a man named Gourlay, half Cobbett, half Hunt, who has been perplexing the province'.² No jury, however, would convict. Maitland and his advisers began a devious course. Relying on the legislature's well-known jealousy of its privileges, he included in his first speech a reference to the situation: 'you will, I doubt not, feel a just indignation at the attempts which have been made to excite discontent and to organize sedition. Should it appear to you that a convention of delegates cannot exist without danger to the constitution, in framing a law of prevention your dispassionate wisdom will be careful that it shall not unwarily trespass on that sacred right of the subject to such a redress of his grievances by petition.'³ A series of resolutions was passed which affirmed, while guarding the right of petition, 'that the commons house of assembly are the only constitutional representatives of the people of this province'. Gourlay's convention at York, 'for the purpose of deliberating upon matters of public concern,' was pronounced 'highly derogatory and repugnant to the spirit of the constitution of this province' and tending 'greatly to disturb the public tranquillity'. His supporters were treated to some sound advice on the folly of good citizens endangering the security and the good name of Upper Canada both in the United States and in England by 'lending their countenance to measures so disgraceful'.¹ A statute was passed constituting such meetings unlawful assemblies and making those in any way connected with them guilty of high misdemeanour.² Gourlay attacked the bill in the public press. His article was promptly pronounced a gross libel by the assembly³ and the editor was severely punished. Proceedings were taken against Gourlay under the old alien Act of 1804. An ignorant and uneducated member of the assembly, Isaac Swayzie, actually swore against common knowledge that Gourlay had not resided in the province for the statutory six months, and that he was a seditious character. It was little wonder, when ordered to leave the province within ten days, that Gourlay ignored the verdict. He was arrested and imprisoned. He established the falsity of the charges against himself on a writ of habeas corpus before the chief justice, who, however, refused bail on a technicality. For months he lay in Niagara jail, and when finally he was tried he was no longer capable of self-control. He was condemned on a mere quibble—that he had not left the country when ordered—and sentenced to death without benefit of clergy unless he departed from Upper Canada within twenty-four hours. Gourlay lived to be an old man. His sufferings were pronounced illegal and unconstitutional by the Canadian parliament in 1842. Finally he returned to Canada and was granted an annual pension which he refused to accept. Those who had been indiscreet enough to attend his convention suffered. If they had claims to lands, they could not enter into possession of them until they had confessed their sins to the lieutenant-governor, and asked pardon for their indiscretion and the obliteration of the stigma on their characters. So grave was the offence that such cases were referred to England.¹ Maitland actually told the legislature that he did not consider himself justified in granting lands to the veterans of the late war who had been foolish enough to support Gourlay. The councils approved of his action, but he only carried the assembly by the casting vote of the speaker.²

¹ Sherbrooke to Goulburn, June 8, 1818, State Papers, Q. 148-2, p. 411.

² Maitland to Bathurst, August 19, 1818, ibid., Q. 324-1, p. 129.

³ Journals of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada (October 12, 1818), p. 3 (Ontario Archives, 1913). Maitland deplored the fact that the executive were not sufficiently alive to the dangers, and he claimed that he himself urged the resolutions and subsequent Act: State Papers, Q. 325-1, p. 233.

¹ Journals, &c. (October 22, 1818), p. 16.

² November 27, 1818, Doughty and McArthur, op. cit., p. 554. This Act was repealed two years later.

³ Journals, &c. (July 5, 1819), p. 173.

Gourlay's history, taken by itself, proves that he was foolish and impulsive, and that he lost excellent opportunities for constructive reform by flying too much in the face of unfavourable conditions and by allowing his pen to conquer his sanity. His character does not enter into the question. An unbiased examination of his authentic words and acts up to his departure from the province does not disclose anything which might not pass as justifiable in the ordinary give and take of public life. There is a certain ruggedness and an offensive vulgarity in his writings which can be put down to the conditions of the time; but no effort was made to examine his charges or to refute them with evidence. Gourlay's deadly sin was that he even ventured to suggest that the governing class were not doing their very best for the province. The deadly sin of the 'family compact' was that it made criticism sedition and calendered in the criminal code any opposition with disloyalty. The spirit of the Elizabethan council animated the executive of Upper Canada.

With the 'crazy democrat' out of the country, Maitland and the governing clique affected to feel secure. The cry of 'disloyalty' had apparently done its work. They singularly misjudged the situation. The province was full of men who stood by 'reform' principles, and the assembly was far from being a servile tool. The only insight which the executive seems to have possessed was in realizing that Upper Canadians were easily moved by the suggestion of treason. On the other hand, when men who had fought to defend Upper Canada against the United States were deprived of their land grants for venturing to attend a meeting which confirmed the opinions of the greater part of the province, trouble was inevitable. In so far as Gourlay might be seditious his teachings would command popular opposition; but when the 'family compact' condemned them without distinction or discrimination, public opinion soon began to question the whole Gourlay episode. It stands then as a necessary prelude to the history of reform in Upper Canada. Gourlay made a challenge, and before long tory and reformer were clear-cut designations in politics. The reforming zeal of Gourlay and his friends had attacked the land system as the most evident cause of distress and stagnation. Failing redress from the governing class, and finding that all complaints were brushed aside as sedition, men came into the political arena to demand reform not merely in social and economic affairs, but in the constitution and in the political machinery which sanctioned injustice and inequality.

¹ Cf. a petition from Ensign Hicock in these terms to Maitland, October 16, 1822, State Papers, Q. 331, pp. 230 ff.

² Journals, &c. (June 7, 9, 1819), pp. 99, 101.

Almost at once the forces began to organize. The most obvious point of attack was the house of assembly, and in 1821 a strong United Empire loyalist constituency, Lennox and Addington, returned Barnabas Bidwell, Gourlay's friend, at a by-election. In the assembly, the tory group challenged his election and questioned his past. By a majority of one he was expelled from the assembly.¹ The election of his son, Marshall

¹ Journals (January 4, 1822), pp. 149 ff. (Ontario Archives, 1915). Cf. Maitland to Bathurst, April 15, 1822, State Papers, Q. 331, p. 90. There is an account

Spring Bidwell, was voided by the assembly because he was an alien, but in 1824 the same constituency chose him as its member, and he was allowed to hold his seat.¹ The 'Bidwell affair', as it was called, emphasized the discontent over the alien question, which had become serious for several reasons. In 1820 the province had been redivided into counties and population had been made the basis of representation. Under this Act thirty-eight members were returned to the assembly. When the Bidwells were challenged, the whole question of citizenship was opened up. In addition, in 1824 a ruling had been handed down by the chief justice of England that those who had remained in the United States after 1783 could not retain or transmit British citizenship, and that they could not inherit real estate within the empire. The opinion came as a bombshell into Upper Canada, for it meant that a large percentage of the population were not British citizens, and that their titles to land were invalid. So grave was the situation that Maitland received a dispatch directing him that it was advisable to sanction local legislation conferring 'civil rights and privileges of British subjects upon such citizens of the United States as being heretofore settled in Canada are declared by the judgement of the courts of law in England and by the opinion of the law officers to be aliens; and of including in the same enactment the disbanded officers and soldiers of foreign corps which were in the British service, and such foreigners resident in Canada, who are in truth aliens, though they have hitherto enjoyed without question the rights of British subjects'.² The legislative council passed a bill along the lines of this dispatch, but it was strongly opposed in the assembly on the by an eyewitness of Bidwell's dramatic defence of himself before the legislature in a letter from William Macaulay to John Macaulay, December 31, 1821, Macaulay Papers, [A], E. 45-6, iii. 3 (Ontario Archives).

¹ Journals, &c., pp. 216-17, 306, 313-14, 441-4.

² Bathurst to Maitland, July 22, 1825, Colonial Office Records, Q. 371-A, p. 43.

ground that it did not grant complete naturalization. The assembly and many of the people regarded the proposals as some kind of cunning attack. Maitland was apparently acting according to instructions, but suspicion was abroad and a bitter controversy followed in which the executive lost ground. Finally, in 1828 an Act was passed acceptable to the vast majority. British birth was conferred on those who had received crown grants, who had held public offices, who had taken the oath of allegiance, and on all who had resided in the province since 1820. All others resident on March 1, 1828, were to be admitted to the rights and privileges of citizenship after seven years and on taking a prescribed oath. The imperial parliament extended to all persons naturalized by the legislature of Upper Canada the right to become eligible for seats in the legislative council and in the assembly, as well as that of voting for members of the latter. The dispute was not settled, however, before an opinion had grown up that the local government intended to deal in an arbitrary way with American settlers.

During the Maitland régime, the status of the church of England fell across the political life of the province and accentuated the constitutional situation. The Simcoe theory that the church of England was the established church of Canada had never been abandoned. There were thus religious disabilities under which the non-episcopal protestant churches laboured. Their ministers could not solemnize marriages. The assembly passed a bill in 1824 removing this grievance and 'authorizing ministers of the Society of Methodists to solemnize marriage'. The legislative council rejected the bill. This was the beginning of a fatal policy. Religion was thrown into the political arena, and the Methodists, a growing communion in the province, were given a political grievance. Even when the disability was substantially rectified in 1829, nonconformist clergy were required to take out a certificate from the court of quarter sessions in their district, while clergymen of the church of England solemnized marriages ex officio.¹

Under the Constitutional Act of 1791 large reserves of land for 'the protestant clergy' had been sanctioned. In 1823 the discontent in connexion with this question passed from the social into the political sphere. Resolutions and an address were carried in the house of assembly in that year claiming a share in the clergy reserves for the church of Scotland as an established church.² The election of 1825 brought in a strong group of reformers which included Marshall Bidwell, Peter Perry, John Rolph, and John Matthews, as well as William Morris, who had taken a prominent part in connexion with the resolutions in favour of the church of Scotland. With Bidwell an outstanding figure, opposition was organized against the government. An address was drawn up protesting against any increase in the clergy reserves and praying that the present reserves should not be confined to the church of England, but should be shared in by all christian denominations.³ Maitland informed the assembly that no increase was intended. Undeterred, the assembly protested that 'protestant clergy' did not mean clergy of the church of England exclusively, and suggested the sale of the lands for the support of education and of religion in general. Strachan entered the fray with 'an ecclesiastical chart of Upper Canada' in favour of an Anglican 'majority' in the province.⁴ Egerton Ryerson replied on behalf of the Methodists, and the house of assembly challenged the implied position of the church of England both in an address and in a report from

¹ See a fully documented study by W. R. Riddell, 'The Law of Marriage in Upper Canada' (Canadian Historical Review, vol. ii, pp. 226 ff.).

² Journals, &c., pp. 560 ff., 606 ff.

³ Maitland to Bathurst, March 7, 1826, State Papers, Q. 340-1, p. 33. The assembly had become alarmed over transactions, in which the 'clergy reserves' figured, between John Galt and the British government. See R. K. Gordon, John Galt, pp. 45 ff. (University of Toronto Studies, 1920).

⁴ Strachan to Wilmot Horton, May 16, 1827, State Papers, Q. 345-2, p. 342.

a special committee of the house on Strachan's chart.¹ The dispute was laid before the select committee on the civil government of Canada in 1828.² In its report special attention was drawn to the political difficulties created in Upper Canada by the position granted to the church of England by the subservience of the legislative council. Nothing, however, was done, and 'the most mischievous practical cause of dissension',³ as Durham called 'the clergy reserves', remained to form, as we shall see, a motive for rebellion. The reserves and the money coming in from them were finally secularized in 1854 by a Canadian Act, which facetiously recited the desirability of 'removing all semblance of connexion between church and state'.

The religious question thus became the main key to the political situation in Upper Canada. The governing clique, however, were not content to let the issues crystallize. They pursued a pin-prick policy. John Matthews had his pension as a half-pay officer stopped, and he was ordered to return to England, because he was present at a performance given by a company of American actors, under the patronage of the assembly. The evening was old-world in its conviviality, and the audience momentarily forgot the 'family compact', when 'Yankee Doodle' was rendered with 'hats off'. The Colonial Advocate of William Lyon Mackenzie had been transferred from Queenston to York in November 1824. In the following summer the printing press was wrecked by a group of young bloods. Of course the authorities had no part in the attack, and of course it was a youthful revenge for much abuse; but the reform party interpreted it as a premeditated action inspired by the older heads. It brought a strange vengeance, for the damages awarded to Mackenzie and collected among the 'family com-

¹ Maitland to Huskisson, May 12, 1828, State Papers, Q. 347, p. 16; George Ryerson to Hay, June 7, 1828, ibid., Q. 350-2, p. 341.

² See Kennedy, op. cit., p. 346.

³ Report, ii. 179 (ed. Lucas).

fact 'reconstructed not merely his press and paper, but his fortunes. Other instances of foolish policies—some wilful, some perverse, some accidental, but all arrogant—might easily be drawn from the history of Maitland's régime. Their force was cumulative, though they contributed only indirectly to the main issues. They were witnesses to a state of mind in government circles rather than permanent influences. Maitland was recalled in August 1828, but he did not leave Canada before the province had given a judgement on his rule. In the elections which were held previous to his departure, the 'family compact' in all its ramifications was the predominating issue. Everything was called into service—clergy reserves, the marriage legislation, Strachan's chart, freedom of the press. Echoes were even heard of Gourlay's convention and of the persecution of those who had attended it. The government had no episode ready of sufficient notoriety to be given a disloyal tinge, and the reformers gained a respectable majority which included William Lyon Mackenzie, Jesse Ketchum, Marshall Bidwell, John Rolph, and Peter Perry. Robert Baldwin in 1829 was elected to fill the seat vacated by John Beverley Robinson on his appointment as chief justice. When Maitland left, the state of affairs was by no means hopeless; but he handed over a delicate enough situation to his successor Sir John Colborne, who was perhaps as good a man as any available. Although a soldier and an outstanding figure at Waterloo and a tory of the old school, Colborne possessed a kindly personality and a sympathetic character. Behind his professional rigidity and his somewhat self-conscious devotion to the dignity of his office, he had more insight into civil problems than any of his predecessors. He would have succeeded under more favourable conditions. His sympathies were chilled by the cold exclusiveness of the oligarchy and his insight warped by his being compelled to take advice from those who professed to have the only adequate grasp of local affairs.

The British government desired to do something along the lines suggested by the report of 1828, and Colborne's instructions represented the intent and extent of that purpose.¹ For the present there was no necessity to open up the question of revenue control, and as a matter of fact if trouble arose the government could easily be maintained. On the 'clergy reserves' full information was asked, and a promise was given that any proposals concerning education, especially such as might deal with the 'exclusive connexion' of the University with the church of England, would receive very careful consideration. There were doubts about making the judges independent; but the legislative council would be rendered less subservient by discontinuing the appointment of officials to it. Before Colborne had time to orientate himself the assembly opened an attack. The address to the lieutenant-governor was based on the idea that the elected of the people ought to be the advisers of the crown, and he was warned of the fatal consequences which would follow a continuance of the traditional policy. Wounded feelings, injured interests, and popular discontent would be the price paid for power. The complete control of finance and the right of appropriation were, unfortunately for the future, vain cries in the constitutional night, for the executive could afford to neglect threats in this connexion. Colborne, with no insight as yet into political and social conditions, was unable to give any adequate reply. A dry platitude that it was easier to find troubles than to efface them did not help.

A short residence, however, soon convinced him where the sources of trouble lay. Of the seventeen members of council, not more than fifteen ever attended, and of these, six belonged to the executive council, and four held offices under the government. 'Composed as the legislative council is at present, the province has the right to complain of the great influence of the executive council in it.'¹ He hoped to make the second chamber more independent. In the religious-political world his observation was equally keen. He found that Strachan's political course had destroyed his clerical influence, and the dissenters, in seeking to protect their communions against him, had become political bodies. The lieutenant-governor was forced to confess that he could not blind himself so far as not to be convinced that the political part which Strachan had taken in Upper Canada had destroyed his value as a clergyman, had injured the episcopal church, and had done harm to real religion.² If there was going to be a militant established church with a champion in the councils in Upper Canada, Colborne at once saw that the province would have to be governed in opposition to the wishes of the vast majority of the people.

¹ Murray to Colborne, September 29, 1828, Colonial Office Records, Q. 372, [A], pp. 53 ff. (Canadian Archives).

Colborne was more or less helpless. When the assembly in 1830 asked him to dismiss his advisers, as they had lost the confidence of the country, he could only return a curt thanks for the address. His keeping silence even from good words must have seemed to justify itself, for the reformers lost the next election. It is impossible to decide the reasons for the change. At any rate two may be suggested. Colborne had nothing of Gore's pettiness and of Maitland's subserviency, and Anglo-Saxon common sense grasped the fact that he was just and honourable. In addition, a reform assembly was helpless against the legislative council. The average voter, who had plumped for a new heaven and a new earth, did not grasp the constitutional difficulties. Ceaseless speeches, manifold committees, democratic addresses, spent themselves in vain against the serried phalanxes of privilege, and the voters who had looked for reforming bread and received doctrinaire stone must have been a little disappointed. The campaign is otherwise interesting. Mackenzie issued a platform which included the independence of the judges, reform of the legislative council, religious equality, and 'an executive government responsible for its conduct'. The appeal was clear-cut and the rejection is inexplicable except for the reasons suggested. At the same time, it is worth while to remember that as long as Beverley Robinson led the government party in the assembly there was a certain amount of dignity. His was talented arbitrariness. When Henry John Boulton, Robinson's successor, and Christopher Hagerman led the tory forces, tactful autocracy gave place to domineering aggressiveness and they drove the iron into the soul of a people. As events proved it was fortunate for Upper Canada that the election turned out as it did. To this assembly fell the lot of dealing with the financial proposals under the imperial Act of 1831.¹ Early in the session a permanent civil list was granted, and thus one source of irritation was removed.

¹ Colborne to Murray, February 16, 1829, State Papers, Q. 351-1, p. 29.

² Colborne to Hay, March 31, 1829; same to Bishop of Quebec, February 13, 1829, ibid., pp. 86, 106.

Had Hagerman and Boulton been content to let Mackenzie, Perry, and their like blow off steam in the absence of more moderate reformers from the house, and to accept with something of Robinson's political wisdom the civil list which lifted the lieutenant-governor, the judges, and themselves as solicitor-general and attorney-general out of the turmoil of an annual vote, there might have been no rebellion. Mackenzie was taken too seriously. His opposition to the civil list was based on the comprehensive principle of being always against the government. When it was passed, he flooded the dykes of administration with an ocean of abusive rhetoric. Real reform—and there was much of it in his speeches and writings—was discounted by excess and lack of discrimination. The Colonial Advocate enjoyed a perfect surfeit of vilification. The executive was compared with the arbitrary, iron despotism of the czar, and the constituencies which returned government supporters were impaled on the finest points of scurrilous ridicule. The 'sycophant' assembly and the 'mean and mercenary' executive at last lost patience. The house declared the editorials breaches of privilege, and Mackenzie was expelled as Boulton's 'reptile' and Hagerman's 'spaniel dog'. Constitutionally and legally right, politically and diplomatically wrong, the assembly made the reforming editor a popular hero. Little York was outraged, and, with a growing self-importance, the inhabitants asked the lieutenant-governor to dissolve the house. Colborne was not so foolish. York, however, returned their maltreated member at the by-election. Necessarily he was admitted to the house, but only to meet a new charge of libel. Once again he was expelled, and, foolishly and illegally, he was declared incapable of holding a seat. Once again his constituents sent him back. As the house was not sitting when the election took place, Mackenzie prepared to seek redress in London and set sail on May 1, 1832. In England he interviewed Lord Goderich, the colonial secretary, and created a mixed but not entirely ineffective impression. Meanwhile Boulton and Hagerman advised the legislature, which opened on October 31, that Mackenzie had no right to sit. The government carried the assembly and a new writ was ordered. In his absence Mackenzie was returned unopposed.

¹ See above, p. 106, note 2.

The assembly was in no mood for discriminating thought. Lord Goderich had sent a dispatch written with care and judgement, in which, however, grievances were recognized.¹ He instructed the lieutenant-governor to publish the dispatch. Colborne hesitated to do so before prorogation and thought that caution should be used 'in dealing with a demagogue formidable from perseverance and cunning'.² Finally he decided to transmit the dispatch to the legislature. The old impatience of criticism once more was in evidence. No attention was paid to the censures on Mackenzie and his methods. Goderich had actually received a man expelled from the assembly, and given him audience as though he were an agent for reporting grievances and oppression.¹ Boulton and Hagerman led the attack on the colonial secretary and Mackenzie was expelled for the fourth time. The home government was growing weary of high-handed proceedings in which legality had now no place. Warnings had been in vain, and Goderich acted after his patience had been exhausted. He informed Colborne that he was surprised that Boulton and Hagerman should hold office and disregard the wishes of the cabinet. He also pointed out, while wishing to interfere in no arbitrary way, that a member of either house who held office at the pleasure of the crown and at the same time could not approve of the policy of the ministry in power must be prepared to choose between his seat and his official situation.² Boulton and Hagerman were promptly dismissed. Boulton managed to get a judicial appointment in Newfoundland, from which he was also removed, and he returned to Canada as a supporter of responsible government. Hagerman wheedled Goderich's successor, Lord Stanley, into restoring him to office. The lieutenant-governor did not escape censure. The tory party were now outraged beyond measure. Loyalty gave place to rebellious sentiments and threats, and the government papers reflected the resentment. It is well to keep in view this state of mind. The 'family compact' group were just as ready to prove recalcitrant as any other group in the province, if their peculiar privileges and their still more peculiar feelings were touched. Mackenzie pricked 'the loyalty-bubble'. The government party were unwilling to accept defeat or censure. Mackenzie was again expelled after a scene of indecorum and passion. For the moment, his ambitions were satisfied when he became first mayor of York on its incorporation as the city of Toronto. Unfortunately for his cause and for the cause of reform, he rashly published a letter from Joseph Hume, the radical politician who had helped him with Lord Goderich, in which Hume anticipated a crisis in Canada 'which [would] terminate in independence and freedom from the baneful domination of the mother country and the tyrannical conduct of a small and despicable faction in the colony'.¹ Mackenzie's indiscretion hurt the reforming party at the elections held in October 1834. Indeed the publication of Hume's letter corresponds in a degree to the issuing of the Ninety-two Resolutions in Lower Canada. Constitutional reformers were alarmed and did not feel secure concerning the future. Ryerson and the Methodists began to separate from what might be considered the Papineau platform.² As it was, the reformers were in the majority in the new assembly. But the Baldwins, Jesse Ketchum, and Rolph had refused to stand, and the party were thus split over Mackenzie's policy. Mackenzie succeeded in having a select committee of the assembly appointed to inquire into grievances. He was elected chairman and all the members were his close followers. The report which this committee brought forward was never formally approved by the assembly, but it may be considered as representing the opinions of the Mackenzie group of reformers.

¹ Goderich to Colborne, November 8, 1832, State Papers, G. 69.

² Colborne to Hay, January 16, 1833, State Papers, Q. 377-1, p. 183.

¹ Colborne to Goderich, February 16, 1833, State Papers, Q. 377-1, p. 218.

² Goderich to Colborne, March 6, 1833, p. 93, Series G. 70, p. 43.

The Seventh Report of Grievances covered most issues in Upper Canadian politics. Patronage, salaries, the church of England, the land department—all were subject to severe criticism. It cannot be denied that there were grievances, but no concessions were made to conditions, and any good results were overlooked. The 'family compact' were nothing if not competent, and while crumbs fell from the rich man's table, there was no real organized public speculation under their régime. The interest of the report lies largely in its discussion of constitutional questions. The committee felt that the machinery of government was behind the grievances. They were justified in complaining that little respect was paid, even in subordinate matters, to the wishes of the assembly. On the other hand, there is no clear suggestion for reform. Under the influence of Lower Canada an elective second chamber was asked for, but there is no hint of the recommendation of cabinet government. The executive council was to be rendered responsible to public opinion, but the method was vague. The committee noticed that some witnesses suggested ministerial responsibility, and the terms approach the idea of cabinet control; but there is nothing in the report which can be interpreted as an acceptance of this suggestion. The report was at once printed and copies were sent to Lord Glenelg, now colonial secretary, and to the members of the imperial parliament. The cabinet was alarmed. Colborne was censured for having misjudged the situation and for withholding full information from the imperial government. He defended himself as best he could. He regretted the attention paid to Mackenzie and his party, who, he was convinced, could not be attached to the government by concessions.¹ He recalled his suggestion of 1832, of filling up the country as speedily as possible with staunch British settlers, as such a policy would eliminate all anxiety about the Canadas and would counteract factions.² The cabinet was convinced that a new policy must be begun, and Colborne was recalled to make room for Sir Francis Bond Head, who was sworn in at Toronto on January 25, 1836. Colborne left the next day to assume command of the military forces in British North America.

¹ Colonial Advocate, May 22, 1834.

² See an address from the Wesleyan conference condemning Hume's letter which Colborne forwarded to Stanley, July 1, 1834, State Papers, Q. 382-2, p. 449.

Colborne did not leave before he carried out an act which was singularly inopportune. He established and endowed out of the clergy reserves forty-four rectories for the church of England. The history is rather confusing. In 1831 the British government decided to abandon the idea of endowment, as the system had proved not only financially futile, but had 'a direct tendency to render odious to the inhabitants' the ministers of religion.¹ A bill was prepared for the provincial legislature repealing the clauses of the Constitutional Act dealing with the clergy reserves and transforming them into crown lands.² The bill was actually introduced by the attorney-general, but it disappeared in Colborne's prorogation of the legislature. In February 1832 Colborne suggested the use of monies from the clergy reserve funds to build rectories or churches. In the following April Goderich concurred in this view. In November 1832 Goderich stated that the imperial government had abstained from endowing literary or other corporations until he should obtain advice from the representatives of the Canadian people. In 1834 and in 1835 the assembly passed bills for the sale of the clergy reserves and for the application of the monies received to education, but the legislative council blocked the scheme. In January 1836, on the eve of his departure, the executive council recommended to Colborne the creation of fifty-seven rectories and patents were issued for forty-four. Colborne and the executive council could plead implicit approval; but the whole thing was carried through without the immediate knowledge of the imperial government. At any rate, while Colborne had the law on his side, there can be little doubt that the action was impolitic and frictional. The idea of creating rectories and endowing them was at least as old as Maitland's time; but the fact that there had been varieties of opinion even in imperial circles made Colborne's last official act take on the appearance of a challenge. The province began to view the church of England as a subtle schemer taking advantage of a situation before conciliation could become an active policy.

¹ Colborne to Glenelg, September 16, November 9, December 2, 1835, State Papers, Q. 387-1, p. 98; Q. 387-2, pp. 279, 349, 410.

² Colborne to Hay, September 21, 1832, ibid., Q. 374-4, p. 887.

Head's appointment provides an opening for criticism of the colonial office. Unknown in any capacity save as a poor law commissioner, no one was more surprised than Head himself when he was roused from his bed to receive the king's messenger offering him the lieutenant-governorship of Upper Canada.¹ He had the common sense to decline the offer, but Glenelg was insistent, and there began in January 1836 a régime almost tragical in its fatuity. Its only redeeming feature is the comic figure of the lieutenant-governor, who within a few weeks developed to his own satisfaction theories of colonial government childish in their folly. Head ostensibly came to Canada to carry out concessions in answer to the report on grievances. It was little wonder then that he was received in Toronto as a popular hero and as 'a tried reformer'.² The length to which Lord Glenelg was prepared to go can be seen from his instructions issued to Head.³ Patronage could not be abandoned entirely, as every person in office must be held subordinate to the head of the government. Whatever patronage was unnecessary in preserving that principle might be given up. A general retrenchment in expenditure was recommended in so far as compatible with efficiency. The cabinet refused to interfere in relation to the dispute over the clergy reserves, which was a local matter and not of such vital importance as to demand imperial legislation. With regard to responsible government, Glenelg was a strict constructionist. He held that there was plenty of responsibility. The lieutenant-governor was accountable to king and parliament—'a responsibility which was second to none,' and the assembly could bring it into active operation at any time by address or petition. Every public officer must hold his position at the pleasure of the crown, and he must be removed if he opposed the lieutenant-governor's policy. These principles, according to Glenelg, constituted an 'effective system of responsibility'.

¹ Goderich to Colborne, November 21, 1831, Series G. 68, p. 251.

² Colborne to Goderich, February 3, 1832, State Papers, Q. 374-1, p. 177.

¹ There is a tradition that the appointment was made in error and was intended for Sir Edmund Head. Cf. Hincks, Reminiscences of his Public Life, pp. 14 ff. (Montreal, 1884).

² He was actually recommended as such to Mackenzie by Hume: Hume to Mackenzie, December 5, 1835, Robinson Papers, [A], E. 22-3, ii. 10 (1) (Ontario Archives). See F. B. Head, A Narrative, pp. 32 ff. (London, 1839).

³ Glenelg to Head, December 5, 1835, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 412 ff.

Before long Head grasped the implications of the scheme. He was viceroy, responsible to no one in Canada. Downing Street had given him an excellent system and one free from ambiguities. Almost at once he took a violent dislike to Mackenzie and Bidwell, but in his rôle as 'tried reformer' some public act was necessary, and he called to the executive council Robert Baldwin and John Rolph. Head's theoretical popularity now became actual. He was hailed as the father of responsible government, and there can be no doubt that Baldwin and the reformers believed that Head had inaugurated a new constitutional régime. 'The appointment of executive councillors', wrote Bidwell, 'gives us great satisfaction. It was with our full approbation, and I may say at our request, that these gentlemen accepted office. They have our entire confidence and go in without the least sacrifice of principle.'¹ Appearances had been deceptive. Head had no idea of being guided by an executive council. He went his own way, and when he asked advice he rejected it as lightly as he had requested it. On March 4 the entire executive council protested, and asserted that they were held responsible in public opinion for measures which had never received their approval. Head replied in the strict letter of his instructions: 'The lieutenant-governor maintains that the responsibility to the people (who are already represented in the house of assembly) which the council assume is unconstitutional; that it is the duty of the council to serve him, not them; and if on so vital a principle they persist in a contrary opinion, he foresees embarrassments of a most serious nature—for as power and responsibility must, in common justice, be inseparably connected with each other, it is evident to the lieutenant-governor, that if the council were once to be permitted to assume the latter, they would immediately as their right demand the former.' On March 12 the executive council resigned in a body, and Head lost no time in forming a new council of four, which was immediately met with a resolution in the assembly maintaining the principle of 'a responsible executive council to advise the lieutenant-governor on the affairs of the province'. Ten days later the assembly passed a vote of no confidence in the new council. Head talked louder and less guardedly than ever, and the assembly finally refused supplies. In the issue the lieutenant-governor harangued the house for over an hour and finally dissolved it. Writs were issued for an election in June.

¹ M. S. Bidwell to A. N. Buell, February 26, 1836, Jones Papers, [A], E. 36, 2 (5) (Ontario Archives).

Head entered the fray with Francis Gore's experiment behind him. He became a political leader with all the patronage of the province at his disposal. He entered it, too, at issue with the colonial office. Glenelg would not grant his request to obtain the repeal of the revenue Act of 1831, and sent him a dispatch, which had already been forwarded to New Brunswick, instructing him to introduce into the executive council men having the confidence of the people. Head ran the elections on his own plans: he made a personal appeal and placed the choice between himself and the reformers. The old bogey of disloyalty was brought out of the campaign cupboards. The Tories rallied round it as in the days of Maitland. Their opponents organized to obtain an elective legislative council, an executive responsible to public opinion, the surrender and control of all provincial revenue and the elimination of the imperial cabinet from the internal affairs of the colony. Head swept the country, and the reformers were virtually wiped out. The disloyalty cry undoubtedly worked wonders in the mouth of a lieutenant-governor, and personal influence—and perhaps more—turned many votes. But the controlling force in the election was the Methodists under the direction of Egerton Ryerson. Ryerson feared the future, and there must have been a strong sense of impending danger when he led his followers into the tory and Anglican camp.¹

The lieutenant-governor now lost all sense of proportion. He informed Glenelg that, after a single-handed combat in the severest moral issue in colonial history, he had 'saved the Canadas'. Glenelg could not withhold congratulations, but he pointed out that mere 'transient results or temporary triumphs' were not looked for by the government. After a tour of the province, Head summoned the legislature. The outstanding difficulties remained. It is true that the erection of rectories was ratified, but the clergy reserves could not be settled, as the Methodists wavered between a religious or an educational application of the funds. Supplies, however, were granted in profusion, and large votes were made for improvements in spite of a huge debt and of a grave financial situation among the banks of the United States. The promised 'economic reform' which had figured so largely in the election campaign did not make its appearance, and before long Head's triumph had lost whatever significance it may have had. The colonial office grew tired of his conceit, especially as he had broken away from the theory of government which he so gladly accepted from his instructions. He dismissed officials on suspicion and refused to restore them when ordered by the cabinet. He also declared his unwillingness to promote Bidwell to the next vacant judgeship at the bidding of the colonial office. Glenelg could only fall back on his theory of responsibility and recall the almost independent lieutenant-governor.

Before the recall reached Toronto, armed rebellion had broken out, and it was due in no small measure to Head's foolish self-confidence in denuding the province of troops. The details of the rebellion lie outside this history, but when the mingled blood of Upper Canadian and Lower Canadian was drained to a common earth, Canadians gained the first constitutional step towards political liberty. On the surface the 'family compact' had triumphed; but the rebellion was symptomatic. Small in itself, it was enough to convince the imperial cabinet that the constitution was worn out. When a British province took up arms against the administration it was high time to seek the fundamental causes. The Canadian rebellions brought Lord Durham to Canada. Sir Francis Head, however, did not pass out of Canadian history without memorials for which students may be grateful. His legislative council and his 'bread and butter' assembly¹ drew up reports on the state of the provinces, which are in many respects remarkable documents.² Naturally the theories of the old colonial system colour the criticism, and there is much praise for Head and 'loyal men'. On the other hand, there is insight and restraint. The summary of Lower Canadian history is of the greatest value, and imperial policy in that province is subjected to an examination which cannot be overlooked. Both reports attacked severely the colonial office for its imperfect knowledge of colonial affairs, for its want of stability and firmness, and for its absence of constructive continuity. Indeed, the dissatisfaction was so strong that a board of empire was suggested which should have Canadian members. There was a dawning vision of a united British North America expressing itself in representation of all the American colonies in the imperial parliament. However hard history has been forced to deal with the political faith and the administrative practice of the tory group in

¹ Ryerson, Story of my Life, ch. xviii ff. (edited J. G. Hodgins, Toronto, 1883).

¹ 'If you choose to dispute with me and to live on bad terms with the mother country, you will—to use a homely phrase—only quarrel with your bread and butter': Head to the electors of the District of Newcastle.

² Journals of the Legislative Council, February 13, 1838; Journals of the Assembly, Appendix, 1837-8, pp. 257 ff. The latter is partially printed in Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 448 ff. Both reports were published in pamphlet form in 1838.

Upper Canada, it is impossible to question the intellectual vigour of writings such as these, and the uncanny skill with which they distributed praise and blame.

[AUTHORITIES.—The Journals of the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly; A. G. Doughty and D. A. McArthur, Documents of the Constitutional History of Canada, 1791-1818 (Ottawa, 1914); Egerton and Grant, Canadian Constitutional Development (Toronto, 1907); Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759-1915 (Oxford, 1918); The State Papers, Q. 278-Q. 358, Q. 374-Q. 395 (Canadian Archives); Series of Original Dispatches, Upper Canada, G. 53-G. 107 (Canadian Archives); Canadian Archives Report, 1891, 'Note E: Marriage Law in Upper Canada'; 1892, 'Note D: Political State of Upper Canada, 1806-7'; 1896, 'Note C: Roman Catholic Church in Upper Canada'; 1897, 'Note A: Proposed Union, 1822'; 1898, 'Note C: Naturalization Question'; 1899, 'Note A: The Clergy Reserves'. The best general introduction is W. Stewart Wallace, The Family Compact (Toronto, 1915): this book is founded on careful and thorough research and has a useful bibliography. Charles Lindsey, The Life and Times of William Lyon Mackenzie (2 vols., Toronto, 1862), is the official biography based on private papers. C. W. Robinson, Life of Sir John Beverley Robinson (Edinburgh and London, 1904), is valuable but is formal and uninspiring. All Gourlay's publications are valuable, especially the Banished Briton and Neptunian (Boston, 1843) and Statistical Account of Upper Canada (2 vols., London, 1822), which contains many documents. A. N. Bethune, Memoir of the Right Rev. John Strachan (Toronto, 1870), is useful but inadequate. The Seventh Report from the Select Committee of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada on Grievances (Toronto, 1835), Sir Francis Bond Head, A Narrative (London, 1839), and Glenelg's Dispatches (London, 1839) are essentials, as well as Mackenzie's Colonial Advocate and the New York Albion. In the last can be found the contemporary 'family compact' point of view.]

CHAPTER XI

THE FAILURE OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT IN THE CANADAS

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S ten resolutions did more than lay down principles of colonial government and precipitate rebellions. In Lower Canada they transformed a sentiment into a dangerous hushed melancholy, and in Upper Canada they intensified an aspiration. For the failure of representative government had distinct characteristics in each province, and the different effects of the resolutions on the psychology of Lower Canadians and of Upper Canadians were due to definite causes. Common causes there were, and these will appear later, but the failure can best be considered by beginning with the different backgrounds.

From the fall of Canada Great Britain treated the French-Canadians as a distinct group. In the earlier years the treatment was more or less tentative. It lacked definiteness and insight and never assumed the clearness of a concrete political purpose. There was a good deal of floating sentiment, of kindness, and of generosity which carried French-Canadians across the rough places in British law and the more difficult rough places in British traditions. The beginnings of the colonial troubles, as we have seen, transformed all this. They lifted the whole position out of the realms of emotion into those of practical conceptions. With the Quebec Act the French-Canadian race was given a statutory charter of privileges, and the distinct group life of a distinct nationalism was recognized by law within the empire. The application of this charter to the actual life of the province fell to the hands of Carleton and Haldimand, who, for reasons which have already been discussed, interpreted it in the strictest sense and made the grant far stronger by hiding the spirit of the Act. The British in the province were treated almost as non-existent, and at any rate they were persistently snubbed. In due course the French-Canadian rank and file, who had been at first suspicious of the Danaän gift, came to look on the Quebec Act as the visible sign and symbol of their group life, and there grew round it a race emotion which gathered strength with the years. When colonial difficulties again forced a change, no attempt was made to break up this life or to divert this emotion. A British constitution was given to a French people in the fond hope that the alchemy of such generosity would be magical, and that in the laboratory of constitutional experience they would forsake language, laws, religion, and race itself. No account was taken of the peculiar persistence of racial differences, and in the final analysis the French-Canadians bent the constitution to racial ends.

When the shadow of Craig's régime fell across the popular life of Lower Canada, opposition did not express itself fundamentally in political terms, nor did it use political weapons. 'Notre langue, nos institutions et nos lois' seemed on the surface a political trinity, and by the shallow-thinking administration both in the province and in England it was interpreted as an expression of political ends which would be guarded at all costs. As a matter of fact the challenge was one of race, and the triple watchword only stood for things French-Canadian in so far as they were living racial forces. The popular assembly in Lower Canada never in reality took on a political or constitutional aspect. It was an arena for French-Canadianism, an organized expression of race consciousness, a guardian of a people within the gates of an alien system.¹ Its theatrical and persistent vigils were made all the more intense because a few British members represented another race in a French province. They were considered outposts of an anglicizing policy unfortunately entrenched in the lieutenant-governor and the executive and legislative councils. It is impossible to work through any considerable portion of the vast historical papers of the period, or to attempt to view the history with contemporary eyes, without being forced to the conclusion that racial antipathies governed the issues. Behind the quietness which conciliation produced and the aggressiveness which more arbitrary methods intensified, there lay an energizing life deriving its vitality from the most subtle, most tantalizing, and most disintegrating force in history. The clash was inevitable under a constitution which was not framed for such a situation.

¹ 'The cause of the assembly became the cause of the entire race. The principles that it affirmed, the rights that it insisted upon, the whole race affirmed and insisted upon with an emotion that was at the same time enthusiasm and anger. These principles and these rights were in fact synonymous

But a racial clash must express itself in actual concrete actions. It will seldom be satisfied with art, literature, music, or more peaceful spheres than the world of affairs. From the house of assembly there came almost naturally the ever-widening challenges. This was an assembly of French-Canadians elected by French-Canadians. Its business was to make it an effective instrument for French-Canadians. As a consequence, it made all the difference in the world what laws were passed and who interpreted those laws ; what taxes were levied and how they were appropriated. The Lower Canadian house of assembly attacked every one of these problems. It is in reality to miss the essential when these attacks are judged solely from the point of view of constitutional law. Here was the very core of a chapter in political theory. There were fundamental contradictions in being allowed a say in passing laws without controlling the judges who interpreted them ; in being allowed to vote taxes without deciding the items of appropriation ; in being a constitutional part of the government without an effective voice in the administration. The French-Canadian house of assembly never saw these difficulties politically isolated or politically correlated. They attacked one and all, but always when they felt that their race and nationality were in danger. Law the French-Canadian must obey; taxes the French-Canadian must pay; judges the French-Canadian must face; administration the French-Canadian must experience; and the challenge given in turn to each was a challenge fundamentally inspired by racial homogeneity and kept alive by those fears, suspicions, arguments, and aggressions which are the peculiar weapons of nationalism when fettered and unfree in a servile state.

This view of the situation can easily be illustrated. The assembly at one period in its history became enamoured of impeachment. It seemed a logical deduction from a constitution so persistently emphasized as British, and an admirable method of getting even with the protagonists of anti-French proceedings. When the legislative council blocked the plan, there could only be one result. The legislative council must be made French-Canadian by the introduction of the elective principle. If the council threw out bills passed by the French-Canadian assembly, it was high time that the legislative aspirations of a people should be rescued from ineffectiveness. If the governor and executive spent funds drawn from French-Canadian sources, no specious epithet such as 'crown lands and territorial revenues' should render them outside French-Canadian control. The demand for an elective legislative council was perfectly logical. The clamour to control all revenue was perfectly natural. Once nationalism had been recognized, once it had been given an organized voice, it was absurd to expect the French-Canadians to sit down under a British governor, under a council largely British, and to see their racial feelings outraged by judges who were crown servants, their laws discarded by foreigners, and monies derived from their fatherland disbursed by aliens. The demand for an agent in London was equally logical. If communications must be carried on between Lower Canada and the imperial parliament, it was only right that the channel of communication should be French-Canadian or the direct choice of French-Canadians. The desire to exclude the judges was not inspired by any wholesome political theory of rendering them independent. They represented a British system, they were too close to a British executive, they were too likely to be pliable in the hands which created them. A French-Canadian assembly desired no contact with them. The refusal of a civil list yields to the same explanation. It must have seemed absurd to the assembly to be asked to provide permanent pay for an anti-French oligarchy. The fundamental defect of nationalism, its impatience of limitations, ran riot in Lower Canada. The French-Canadians had no conceptions of constitutional reform. Race became a blinding passion, and demanded a sphere of limitless expression. The solitary voices raised in adumbrations of responsible government were those of Neilson and his group. Papineau was swept off his feet by racial emotions, which took in actual issues a political and constitutional aspect. The fundamental race consciousness expressed itself in institutional terms, for in the institutions set up by the Constitutional Act of 1791 French-Canadians professed to find an active scheme for the suppression of their race.

160 FAILURE OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

It may be asked then, why did French Canada not rise as a man in 1837. There are several answers. The rebellion was premature and Papineau's sentiments ran to seed in ineffectual organization. Fortunately, too, the theatrical rodomontade of emotional preparation had stirred the military to something like effective preparedness. The church, however, was the deciding factor. The Roman catholic clergy found it necessary to apply the brakes to the racial machine. There was an obvious probability that the racial troubles might take on a popular political colour, and the church had not had a very happy experience in history with popular movements. The appeal, too, to the institutions of the United States and the foolish hope that aid would come from the hills of republicanism stiffened the back of the hierarchy. It may be said that the Quebec Act saved the situation in 1837-8, and—it may be said also to have created it.

In Upper Canada the failure of the constitution was due to political causes. The popular movement in that province was never racial, although there had been moments when the 'family compact' gave to the term 'Yankee' an ethnological significance. A Yankee was fundamentally a different person from an Upper Canadian loyalist. The history of reform in Upper Canada is that of an appeal against constitutional rigidity. Simcoe's ideal had become stereotyped in institutional stagnation. There was a recognized privileged class in the executive and legislative councils—a group had cornered the administration. The church of England held the position of an established and privileged communion. As a consequence it perpetuated disabilities for which there was no excuse in a new country, it outraged the religious sentiments of the majority of the population, and its endowments cut across the economic and educational life of the province. A privileged social class, a privileged administrative group, and a privileged church had entrenched themselves behind the constitution. The reformers aimed to see if they could not be forced to move without destroying the constitution. The constructive reformers of Upper Canada never dabbled in conventions, complete popular institutions, or direct political control. They desired to remove the constitution from the position of being a rigid shelter for privilege and to work it in such an elastic way as to give freedom and political liberty to all. They practically arrived at a theory of responsible government. They demanded reform for its own sake, for political ends. The problem in Lower Canada was how to lower every barrier for the advantage of race consciousness. The problem in Upper Canada was how to divide political authority so that 'the advice of the house of assembly' might be an efficient fact as well as a constitutional theory. The reformers felt that they had, at least in embryo, a political principle which would preserve the framework of the constitution, while giving it the elasticity of life and the vitality of freedom. To this principle they held fast. The rebellion in Upper Canada never had a chance of success. Mackenzie and his group fell under the influence of Papineau, and, misinterpreting as political the motives of Lower Canadian aggression, they borrowed his theories and rushed to arms without the shadow of the actual or potential support which Papineau had behind him. In addition the people of Upper Canada had no desire to help Lower Canada in arms when they had suffered at the hands of Lower Canada in peace. The constitution of 1791 had left Upper Canadian revenue at the mercy of the Lower Canadian legislature. No effort at a working basis had in reality been successful, and there was in Upper Canada a resentment against the lower province which was too strong to allow any widespread revolt which might be interpreted as a sympathetic rebellion.

The outward expression of race seeking to destroy alien institutions and the outward expression of reform seeking to galvanize the same institutions into life afford an opportunity to consider in common certain functional weaknesses in the constitution of 1791. The crown exercised a very real power in the Canadas. The royal supremacy in religion was recognized in Upper Canada to the detriment of the non-episcopal churches and the growth of constitutional liberty. There was a moment in Lower Canada when its practical exercise was demanded and when religious animosities were in danger of being added to the racial struggle. The theory of crown lands and crown territorial revenue was a common source of friction. First of all, they created economical disadvantages. Through them privilege could be buttressed, immigration controlled, and settlers judiciously placed. They also created enormous strategical advantages in administration. The governor always had at his disposal crown revenues which included funds provided by the home government for the military chest. Thus the crown in Canada could at any time work the machinery of government. The history is full of painful illustrations of the crown's independence of grants and of its carrying on the administration of the provinces without monies voted by the legislatures. This was one of the broad issues. The protagonists of the popular houses in this connexion were often factious and recalcitrant demagogues, but behind their wearisome protests and the endless reiteration of their claims there lies a fact of experience in modern government, that there can be little hope of political stability as long as the executive is financially independent.

In addition, there was in the constitution no definition of the legislative sphere peculiar to the imperial and provincial parliaments. Issues in themselves strictly affecting the provincial life and yet of vital importance to the entire scheme were reserved for the consideration of the British cabinet. Among these was the power to amend the provincial constitutions. To any one only superficially acquainted with the system, it must be clear that there were bound to be clashes between the various constituent parts of the administrative machinery which only constitutional amendments could remove. At first the Lower Canadian assembly, for reasons which have been pointed out, tried petitions for change, but when Great Britain failed to provide remedies which apparently lay with the imperial government to provide, the assembly passed from one point to another until it claimed the power itself of changing the constitution, a position which erected another barrier between the crown and the popular house.

164 FAILURE OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

But perhaps the most serious cause of failure in the functioning of the constitution was the fact that the crown had no constitutional responsibility to the houses of assembly, and yet there could be no legislation without them. The question was how to link up the chief executive authority with the elected chambers. As a matter of fact no adequate answer to that question was found within these years. A financially irresponsible executive was also constitutionally independent, and the houses of assembly in seeking vaguely and for different reasons to cure a disease which they had not in reality diagnosed frequently overstepped their spheres, with the result that they were dissolved time after time. Constitutionally the governors had as much right to dissolve them as the king had to dissolve the imperial parliament, but in the latter case the king would act on the advice of responsible ministers in a spirit of nebulous, if royal neutrality. In the Canadas, when the governors resorted to this extreme, they were driven to act in the capacity of political party leaders. As a consequence another element was added to the growing forces of discontent with the executive, while the houses of assembly became more and more aggressive in asserting what they conceived to be their rights. In Lower Canada a considerable proportion of the executive council were members of the legislative council; in Upper Canada the entire executive council belonged to the legislative council. The situation was made all the more complicated by this state of affairs. The executive and legislative councils were used by the crown as bulwarks against the popular assemblies, and appointments to them were as a rule confined to those who could be relied on to support the administration. The whole system was vitiated by possessing an executive authority which did not need to rely on public opinion.

Two consequences of a serious nature followed. In Upper Canada control passed almost automatically into the hands of a governing clique. Only the good sense of the people held back popular fury, and the rebellion was merely a shadow cast by its flamboyant leader. In Lower Canada events passed from point to point of pathetic folly. It was a fatal move to suggest the union of the two provinces in 1822. When the British cabinet attempted a constitutional change which apparently lay with the imperial government alone, it was embodied in a bill which intensified the racial cause of the French-Canadians. It was equally fatal for Lower Canada to pass through the storm and stress of struggle under leadership which was not only too often undisciplined, but was inspired by racial, not political motives. On the other hand, there was in reality no remedy at hand, and if foolhardy rebellions in both provinces closed the constitutional experiment under the Constitutional Act of 1791, Great Britain had nothing to replace it, just as Oliver Cromwell had no working system ready at the close of the civil war. As we read the history to-day, it is easy to see the points in which the whole scheme was weak, but no one in 1838 had worked out the problem. The sovereignty of the crown seemed an insurmountable obstacle to colonial responsible government. To conceive of a governor responsible to a local executive dependent on a majority in a house of assembly seemed to mean the disintegration of the empire. No one could grasp a constructive via media which would reconcile local autonomy with imperial solidarity.

Lord Durham's words sum up the situation : ' representative government coupled with an irresponsible executive . . . constant collision between the branches of the government ; the same abuse of the powers of the representative bodies, owing to the anomaly of their position, aided by the want of good municipal institutions, and the same constant interference of the imperial administration in matters which should be left wholly to the provincial governments.'¹ Indeed Durham's last sentence hints at an irritating procedure which turned the lieutenant-governors into intendants. The state papers and dispatches of the period illustrate conditions of meticulous supervision, which must have been pregnant sources of resentment. It is wearisome reading to turn page after page of requests for direction about the smallest details of provincial life. The crown in the Canadas was too weak as well as too strong. The representatives of the sovereign never felt secure in matters of no vital importance, and to constitutional issues was added the painful patience of delays in everyday pedestrian affairs. It seemed as though the whole life of the province, from high and difficult political concerns down to humble dealings, was centred at Westminster, and that the lieutenant-governors were merely agents to direct the activities of an outlying imperial machine.

¹ Lord Durham's Report, vol. ii, p. 194 (ed. Lucas, Oxford, 1912).

166 FAILURE OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

The period closes almost in darkness with the non possumus of Russell's resolutions, the tragedy of rebellions, and the suspension of the constitution of Lower Canada. In darkness, but not in entire failure. These years, thick with error, brought with them an invaluable quota of experience. The hushed racial melancholy of Lower Canada and the stifled political aspiration of Upper Canada bore witness to the fact that race could not be crushed or satisfied in its active life by inadequate constitutional recognition, and that a political people could not for ever sit down quietly under the domination of privilege. The persistence of Upper Canada's aspiration is the significant note in the history, and in that persistence lay, as events turned out, happiness for Lower Canada.

CHAPTER XII

LORD DURHAM AND THE AFFAIRS OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA

LORD DURHAM arrived in Canada on May 29, 1838. He came with exceedingly wide powers which can be studied in detail in the various commissions, instructions, and dispatches which he received from the cabinet. They can be summed up in the words of Lord Glenelg. He was given 'a general superintendence over all British North America', and he was to consider any proposals which he might think 'conducive to the permanent establishment of an improved system of government in her majesty's North American possessions'.¹ He also came with a preconceived idea of the future government. Before he left England he had drawn up the outline of a federal plan, believing that under a monarchy such a federation would gradually change into a complete legislative union of all the provinces.²

On his arrival he disclosed the purpose of his mission in a proclamation to the people: 'The honest and conscientious advocates of reform and of the amelioration of defective institutions will receive from me, without distinction of party, race, or politics, that assistance and encouragement which their patriotism has a right to command from all who desire to strengthen and consolidate the connexion between the parent state and these important colonies; but the disturbers of the public peace, the violators of the law, the enemies of the crown and of the British empire will find in me an uncompromising opponent. . . . I invite from you the most free and unreserved communications. I beg you to consider me as a friend and arbitrator, ready at all times to listen to your wishes, complaints, and grievances, and fully determined to act with the strictest impartiality. If you on your side will abjure all party and sectarian animosities and unite with me in the blessed work of peace and harmony, I feel assured that I can lay the foundations of such a system of government as will protect the rights and interests of all classes, allay all dissensions, and permanently establish under Divine Providence that wealth, greatness, and prosperity of which such inexhaustible elements are to be found in these fertile countries.¹ The proclamation proclaimed him a liberal imperialist. His goodwill was immediately evident. He dissolved the old council and appointed a new one, which, with the exception of Dominick Daly, the provincial secretary, consisted of members of his staff. His desire to be surrounded with unbiased advisers met with universal approval.

¹ Glenelg to Durham, January 20, April 21, 1838, Report, vol. iii, pp. 305 ff. (ed. Lucas, Oxford, 1912).

² Charles Buller, 'Sketch of Lord Durham's Mission to Canada', ibid., pp. 336 ff. The idea may have been suggested by Glenelg; see ibid., p. 309.

With all its defects Durham's Report on the affairs of British North America remains the greatest state paper in colonial history. The minutest criticism has been applied to it since the time of its appearance. Much of this criticism is valid. The 'family compact', for example, subjected it to searching examination, and a committee of the legislative council of Upper Canada produced a report in which forceful restraint is combined with a logic which from many points of view can never be denied.² The sections on Upper Canada are decidedly weak. Politically there is fairness, socially and economically there are exaggerations and distorted views. The part dealing with Lower Canada can only be described as brilliant, and the situation there is diagnosed with the greatest insight, which is made all the more remarkable by the occasional slips in fact and errors in interpretation. In his efforts to grasp the problems which called for solution Durham gave himself up to five months of ceaseless activity. His resignation cut him off from perfecting his summary in detail, and had he remained longer it is reasonable to expect that he would have learned more of Upper Canada. He felt, however, that the most pressing issue was that of French-Canadianism, and on it he expended the greater part of his tireless energy. Of the Maritime Provinces he said little. The blow from England fell on him at the moment when he was in the middle of a conference with eastern delegates, and his Report was finished leaving the history a mere sketch, with no comprehensive grasp of the difficulties which the interview brought to light. Contact, however, with the Maritime Provinces brought him into touch with Sir John Harvey of New Brunswick, Sir Colin Campbell and William Young of Nova Scotia, Sir Charles Fitzroy of Prince Edward Island, and others, from whom he learned something of conditions and before whom he laid his plan of British North American federation. The attitude of each eastern province was different for different reasons.

¹ In English and French, enclosed in dispatch to Glenelg, May 31, 1838, State Papers, Q. 246-1, p. 45.

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 470 ff. The legislative assembly also made a report to which a reply was issued by Francis Hincks, editor of the Toronto Examiner, whose paper had made a strong plea for 'responsible government' during Durham's residence in Canada. His pamphlet is entitled A brief Review of the Report of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada on Lord Durham's Report (Toronto, 1839).

In the Maritime Provinces there had been much social, political, religious, and economic progress. In the course of time constitutional friction appeared similar to that in the Canadas. The issues, however, were held well in hand, and there was never any public clamour of a disloyal nature. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the executive council and the legislative council consisted of the same persons. In 1830, when Lord Goderich was dealing with questions raised by the parliamentary report of 1828 on the Canadas, he wrote to the lieutenant-governors of both provinces suggesting the advisability of making the councils more independent by appointing to them a greater number of members who were not government officials and by excluding the puisne judges. Two years later he sent a dispatch to Sir Archibald Campbell, lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, proposing that in future the executive council and the legislative council should not consist of the same members and that the former should be small and include 'one or two influential members of each branch of the legislature'. He also recommended that the legislative council should be increased, and that membership of it should not of necessity carry with it membership of the executive council. Campbell agreed with these suggestions, pointing out that the previous state of affairs constituted an anomaly which ought never to have existed. By a royal commission dated November 20, 1832, New Brunswick was given two distinct councils, one entirely executive and one entirely legislative.

In 1836 a deputation from New Brunswick visited England headed by the reform leader Lemuel Wilmot. They suggested reforms in the personnel of the councils, but they made no demands for responsible government or for an elective second chamber. Their main object was to secure from the colonial office general concessions such as had been offered in the Canadas by Gosford and Head. They asked for the control of the crown revenues in return for a civil list and for a reform in the crown lands' department. These requests were at once granted, and arrangements were agreed on for carrying them out. Unfortunately Campbell feared that the concessions were too extreme, and he carried on an undignified dispute with the house of assembly, dissolving it on a side issue. An election brought him no relief, and finally he resigned. His successor was Sir John Harvey, whom Durham met in Canada, and the reforms agreed on in England were carried out without serious trouble. New Brunswick would have been the gainer from federation. The Maine boundary was still in dispute, and in case of war with the United States New Brunswick would have been the earliest point of attack. Harvey, however, knew that the province had just passed through a political crisis in which reactionary and reform forces had been engaged in a bitter quarrel, and he was not anxious to introduce new proposals before the recent changes had passed out of an atmosphere of local political controversy.

In Nova Scotia the strong English element centred round Halifax stiffened the forces of conservatism, and it was not till 1837 that the councils were separated. When the legislature opened in that year Joseph Howe proposed a series of reform resolutions, demanding among other things that the council should no longer hold their seats for life and 'treat with contempt or indifference the wishes of the people'. Howe made a fighting speech in which he repudiated any separatist or republican tendencies, but claimed the fullness of self-government. The council threatened to refuse the supply bill, and Howe withdrew the resolutions after he had secured a majority in their favour in the assembly. The tactics were admirable. The supply bill was saved, and Howe embodied the resolutions, which had fulfilled their purpose as a test of opinion, in an address to the king. The address asked for the control of the casual and territorial revenues, and an elective legislative council. Failing the latter the assembly desired that the executive and legislative councils should be separated, and that provision should be made in both for a just representation of all the great interests of the province. They also asked that the executive council should include 'some members of the popular branch', and that thus the province might secure 'responsibility to the commons'. Glenelg replied granting the concessions which had been made in the other provinces, but he expressed a doubt as to the possible success of separating the councils.¹ For the moment he avoided reference to the demand for responsibility. He was pleased that the resolutions had been withdrawn. A few months later, in connexion with the request for popular control of the executive, he wrote: 'Her majesty's government must oppose a respectful but at the same time a firm declaration that it is inconsistent with a due advertence to the essential distinctions between a metropolitan and a colonial government and is therefore inadvisable.'¹ The executive and legislative councils were formally separated by Durham's commission and instructions as governor-in-chief of Nova Scotia.²

¹ Glenelg to Campbell, April 30, 1837, Sessional Papers, Canada (1883), No. 70, pp. 17 ff.

In Nova Scotia the issue of responsible government was thus already before the people, and there was no desire to complicate the situation by the discussion of the wider question of federation. William Young called Durham's attention to the situation. Nova Scotia was happy in 'impartial administration of justice, in perfect freedom of conscience, in the unfettered exercise of industry, and in the absence of oppression in every form'. There was, however, discontent over lands, fisheries, and customs, and because of the fact that official salaries, not under control of the legislature, were too large for the means of the colony. Two chief causes of friction overshadowed all others. The councils were unfavourable to all reform, and contained too many members belonging to the church of England; the house of assembly had no effective control.³ Nova Scotia had joined hands with the Canadas.

In Prince Edward Island there was no constitutional difficulty. In 1834 the assembly asked for an executive council distinct from the legislative council. This was refused. When Sir Charles Fitzroy was going out as lieutenant-governor in 1837 Glenelg asked him to examine the composition of the councils. As a result the assembly in the following year renewed their request, and supported it by pointing to the changes just made in Nova Scotia. Fitzroy lent his weight to the petition, which was granted in due course.¹ The real grievances in Prince Edward Island were economic and arose from absentee ownership of most of the land. This had become an ever-growing cause of complaint, and Fitzroy felt that he could not encourage Durham in promoting comprehensive schemes of government with the social situation so grave in the island.

¹ Glenelg to Campbell, July 6, 1837, Colonial Office Papers.

² Instructions to Durham, February 6, 1838, Sessional Papers, op. cit., p. 39.

³ William Young to Durham, September 20, 1838, Report, vol. iii, pp. 12 ff.

(Durham's idea of a federation, gradually changing to a closer union, had to be abandoned.) He found that those who were closest in touch with sentiment in the Maritime Provinces were not encouraging from their personal knowledge of the political situations. In addition means of communication were so inadequate as to rule the plan out of immediate practical politics, and he saw no prospect of at once improving them in such a way as to warrant an appeal to the legislatures of the Maritime Provinces on a union of any kind—a course which he considered essential. The greatest influence, however, in causing him to suggest other changes was Lower Canada. Before he had come into close contact with the French-Canadians he had believed that they were fighting a liberal battle against the forces of reactionary constitutionalism. His enthusiasm underwent a gradual decline, for he could only see stagnant apathy and ignorant indifference in political questions. He had believed, too, that the British were nothing but an oligarchy holding on to power. He found that he was confusing the rank and file with their narrow visionless leaders, and he began to dread that any wholesale neglect of British opinions might hurt imperial unity and might even throw Upper Canada into the hands of the United States. (When he had finally made up his mind definitely on the constitutional changes which he would recommend, he thought that they must be fully applied before any scheme embracing British North America was brought forward. He decided to advise the reuniting of the two Canadas under responsible government. Reunion, as he found things, was a necessary preliminary training towards any greater constitutional synthesis, and it was emphatically essential for the future of French Canada.) Indeed his suggestion was chiefly influenced by the latter consideration.

¹ The dispatches are in Correspondence with Colonial Office, Prince Edward Island, Series G, 275-6 (Canadian Archives). For the constitution of the Legislative and Executive Councils in the Maritime Provinces see British Parliamentary Papers, 1839, vol. xxxiv.

(Durham's proposal for the Canadas was not merely a legislative union. It was a fusion. The French-Canadians were to be absorbed, amalgamated, absolutely united. He had decided on principles in colonial government. Responsible government was the foundation. His study of the situation did not shake him in his theory, but it caused him to propose changes in the conditions without which he believed his theory would not work. The first change was to deprive Lower Canada of its political institutions by merging them into common institutions for the whole of Canada. He had no doubt that the root of the trouble in Lower Canada was racial.¹ This led to a second change. Race must be swamped in the reunion by assuring a British majority. 'The fatal feud of origin, which is the cause of the most extensive mischief, would be aggravated at the present moment by any change which should give the majority more power than they have hitherto possessed. A plan by which it is proposed to assure the tranquil government of Lower Canada must include in itself the means of putting an end to the agitation of national disputes in the legislature, by settling at once and for ever the national character of the province. I entertain no doubts as to the national character which must be given to Lower Canada; it must be that of the British empire.'² Lower Canada was to be slowly but surely anglicized, and nationalism was to be crushed out. 'I repeat that the alteration of the character of the province ought to be immediately entered on, and firmly though cautiously followed up : that in any plan which may be adopted for the future management of Lower Canada the first object ought to be that of making it an English province, and that, with this end in view, the ascendancy should never again be placed in any hands but those of an English population.’¹ His aim was no sham union, no mere merging of the houses of assembly, nothing of a federal nature. Everything French-Canadian, except religion, everything which ‘la nation canadienne’ stood for, was to be entirely crushed. Durham believed his policy was a beneficial one. He had no sympathy with a race consciousness which seemed to him a detriment to advance. French-Canadians were to be saved by compulsion from ‘some idle and narrow notion of a petty and visionary nationality’.² Common institutions, common purposes, common economic interests—all British when the drastic processes were over—would enable French-Canadians to enjoy a common British North American nationality, towards the final creation of which out of all the provinces French Canada would contribute a lost racial individuality.

¹ Report, vol. ii, pp. 63, 72.

² Ibid., p. 288.

To the fused Canadas, to the Maritime Provinces, and to the future united British North America—an ideal which Durham never abandoned—he recommended the grant of responsible self-government. Durham left no doubts as to his meaning. ‘The wisdom of adopting the true principle of representative government and facilitating the management of public affairs by entrusting it to persons who have the confidence of the representative body has never been recognized in the government of the North American colonies. All the offices of government were independent of the assembly.’³ He meant cabinet government in the British constitutional sense ; government by an executive responsible to the majority. ‘I know not how it is possible to secure . . . harmony in any other way than by administering the government on those principles which have been found perfectly efficacious in Great Britain. I would not impair a single prerogative of the crown ; on the contrary I believe that the interests of these colonies require the protection of prerogatives which have not hitherto been exercised. But the crown must on the other hand submit to the necessary consequences of representative institutions ; and if it has to carry on the government in unison with a representative body, it must consent to carry it on by means of those in whom that representative body has confidence'.¹ The Canadas were to be reunited immediately by imperial legislation, but such legislation 'should contain provisions by which any or all of the other North American colonies may, on the application of the legislature, be, with the consent of the two Canadas or their united legislature, admitted into the union on such terms as may be agreed on between them'.² The immediate change and the hoped-for future were both to be made real by entrusting administration to such men as could command a majority in the elected houses. In addition, Durham, who was no doctrinaire theorist, recommended the establishment of thorough municipal government. He saw there the practical political training-ground of his race, and he believed that such a system in all the provinces would not only strengthen the workings of responsible institutions but would deprive the legislatures of occasions to sin.³ He advised imperial legislation for the purpose in immediate connexion with that for the reunion of the Canadas,⁴ and he included municipal organization as an 'essential part of any durable and complete' wider union.⁵

¹ Ibid., p. 296.

² Ibid., p. 265 ; cf. p. 324.

³ Ibid., p. 77.

In recommending responsible cabinet government, Durham knew that he confronted an issue which had already caused much searching of hearts in England. As far back as 1810 Liverpool had denied the possibility of a colonial executive

¹ Report, vol. ii, p. 278.

² Ibid., p. 323.

³ Ibid., p. 287.

⁴ Ibid., p. 324.

⁵ Ibid., p. 322.

being responsible to the local legislature.¹ Glenelg had formulated a theory of responsibility on which Head wrecked himself in Upper Canada, and he had stated that colonial self-government and imperial sovereignty were irreconcilable.² The ten resolutions in 1837 refused the grant as 'unadvisable', and Lord John Russell in proposing them said that he considered the demand that the executive council should be responsible in the same way as a British cabinet was a 'proposition . . . entirely incompatible with the relations between the mother country and the colony. . . . That part of the constitution which requires that the ministers of the crown shall be responsible to parliament and shall be removable if they do not obtain the confidence of parliament is a condition which exists in an imperial legislature and in an imperial legislature only. It is a condition which cannot be carried into effect in a colony—it is a condition which can only exist in one place, namely the seat of the empire'. He repeated the same ideas during the debates in the following January on the suspension of the constitution of Lower Canada. The objections took the form of a political dilemma: if the colonial executive is responsible to the colonial legislature, it cannot be responsible to the British parliament; but the colony is part of the empire, therefore its executive can be responsible to the imperial legislature alone, through a governor responsible to the imperial cabinet.

With these objections in his mind Durham attempted to get out of the difficulty by a division between colonial and imperial subjects: 'I know that it has been urged that the principles which are productive of harmony and good government in the mother country are by no means applicable to a colonial dependency. It is said that it is necessary that the administration of a colony should be carried on by persons nominated without any reference to the wishes of its people; that they have to carry into effect the policy, not of that people but of the authorities at home, and that a colony which should name all its own administrative functionaries would in fact cease to be dependent. I admit that the system which I propose would in fact place the internal government of the colony in the hands of the colonists themselves, and that we should thus leave to them the execution of the laws, of which we have long entrusted the making solely to them. Perfectly aware of the value of our colonial possessions and strongly impressed with the necessity of maintaining our connexion with them, I know not in what respect it can be desirable that we should interfere with their internal legislation in matters which do not affect their relations with the mother country. The matters which so concern us are very few. The constitution of the form of government—the regulation of foreign relations, and of trade with the mother country, the other British colonies, and foreign nations—and the disposal of the public lands, are the only points on which the mother country requires a control. This control is now sufficiently secured by the authority of the imperial legislature, by the protection which the colony derives from us against foreign enemies, by the beneficial terms which our laws secure to its trade, and by its share of the reciprocal benefits which would be conferred by a wise system of colonization. A perfect subordination on the part of the colony on these points is secured by the advantages which it finds in the continuance of its connexion with the empire. It certainly is not strengthened, but greatly weakened, by a vexatious interference on the part of the home government with the enactment of laws for regulating the internal concerns of the colony, or in the selection of persons entrusted with their execution.’¹ Durham’s attempt to draw a clear-cut distinction between colonial and imperial concerns takes no account of overlapping, and as it stands his division would have left the colonies only something like municipal powers. It is, however, to his credit that he saw the way out of the dilemma, and that he anticipated the solution of history in pointing to the dual rôle of the governor.

¹ Liverpool to Craig, September 12, 1810, Kennedy, op. cit., p. 278.

² Glenelg to Head, December 5, 1835, ibid., p. 419; same to Campbell, July 6, 1837, Colonial Office Papers.

¹ Report, vol. ii, pp. 280 ff.

Distinct as was the line which Durham drew, it did not storm the barriers of opposition. Doubtless nothing would have convinced 'the die-hards', whose political logic was too strong for their common sense. But men like Lord John Russell gave anxious hours to what they conceived a hopeless dilemma and could not see the appearance of a solution. It is an entirely unjust view which pictures England holding back in miserly clutch the golden gift of responsible government, and Canada stretching out ineffectual hands in the glory of new-found political wisdom. The political thought of the day was still anchored fast to the Austinian theory of sovereignty. Yet in spite of that, there were many in England who were hard at work on the problem and would have granted Canada responsible government had they been able to reconcile it with imperial sovereignty. When Durham's Report had been laid on the table of the house of commons, and when resolutions were under consideration in June 1839 for the reunion of the Canadas, Russell again spoke on the subject. Durham had not convinced him. He still adhered to his position of two years previously: 'it does not appear to me that you can subject the executive council of Canada to the responsibility which is fairly demanded of the ministers of the executive power in this country. . . . The governor of Canada [acts] not in that high and unassailable position in which the sovereign of this country is placed. He is a governor receiving instructions from the crown on the responsibility of a secretary of state. Here then at once is an obvious and complete difference between the executive of this country and the executive of a colony.'¹ On the other hand, it was well that Russell took over colonial affairs from the feeble Lord Normanby in September 1839. He returned again and again, as we shall see, to wrestle with the dilemma, and finally his dispatches began the transition to responsible government. In addition, students of colonial history and students of political thought can hardly regret the speech just quoted. In answer to it Joseph Howe of Nova Scotia wrote four letters which are not unworthy to stand by Durham's Report.¹ They occupy a distinct place in political literature for their insight into the old colonial system, for their cogency of argument and their powerful logic, combined with the badinage of a native humour.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 478 ff.

Howe began by a series of questions: Was responsible government withheld from a suspicion of disloyalty? Colonial loyalty would bear examination. Was Lord Durham's remedy for the situation and discontent dangerous? There were no dangers. Did dependence in an empire imply constitutional inferiority? If so, why should a minority rule? Would a majority be more 'disloyal' under their own government than under the continual irritation of an executive pleasing only to a small minority? Was the queen in danger because the citizens of London governed themselves? Would the lord mayor declare war on France? Would Canada do it? He then proceeded to examine carefully Russell's objections to responsible government. The governors could be made responsible to the assembly as the ministers of the crown in England without any invasion of the crown's sovereignty. If they received unconstitutional advice, what then? Might not this occur in England? Suppose a typical governor made mayor of Liverpool, with all the present bag and baggage of dispatches, instructions, and all the present method of government as known in the North American provinces, 'he must be an angel of light indeed if he does not throw the good city of Liverpool into confusion'. What would be the answer to such a result? The 'mayor' could blame some one else—could throw the responsibility on the 'colonial office'. 'No form of government could well be devised more ridiculous.' The 'mayor's' officials—the executive—would be much more irresponsible. Howe followed Durham's division of jurisdictions. The questions involved were those of local, not imperial concern. No governor could constitutionally allow interference in foreign affairs, and a declaration of war would only be the act of madmen. If there were difficulties in connexion with trade or commerce, irresponsible government had failed to solve them. Russell might ask what is proposed. Howe replied that foreign affairs, control of the naval and military forces, colonial trade with Great Britain, and that general supervision analogous to that over an incorporate town would be left to the imperial parliament. The colonial secretary's duties must become those of mere oversight. The governors, who on their arrival were like ignorant 'overgrown schoolboys', must in future find themselves surrounded by 'schoolmasters' who had the confidence of the colony which they were supposed to govern wisely, and not by those who only represented themselves, or a minority, or the whims of their excellencies' predecessors. The governors would then 'do no wrong in any matter of which the colonial legislature had the right to judge'. Under responsible government Papineau and Mackenzie might never have existed as rebels; perhaps they might have developed into constructive statesmen.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 480 ff.

[AUTHORITIES.—The standard edition of Durham's Report is Sir Charles Lucas, Lord Durham's Report (3 vols., Oxford, 1912). The notes and introduction are invaluable. A careful analysis of Durham's work in Canada and of his conclusions is in F. Bradshaw, Self-government in Canada (London, n.d.). The most important of his dispatches are in Egerton and Grant, Canadian Constitutional Development (Toronto, 1907), and Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759-1915 (Oxford, 1918); see also British Parliamentary Papers, 1839, vol. xxxii. The State Papers are in Canadian Archives, Series G, vols. xxxviii-xli; Series Q. 246.1-Q. 247. For the Maritime Provinces, the State Papers are in the Canadian Archives and are in process of reconstruction. J. A. Chisholm, The Speeches and Public Letters of Joseph Howe (2 vols., Halifax, 1909), is essential. G. M. Grant, Joseph Howe (Halifax, 1904), and W. L. Grant, The Tribune of Nova Scotia: A Chronicle of Joseph Howe (Toronto, 1915), are valuable, and the latter is very suggestive and written with great insight. J. Hannay, Wilmot and Tilley (Toronto, 1907), is useful. Valuable documentary material is in Canada Sessional Papers, 1888, No. 70; House of Commons Papers, Nova Scotia, &c., August 1839, No. 579.]

CHAPTER XIII

LORD SYDENHAM'S COLONIAL SYSTEM

LORD DURHAM'S insistence on the reunion of the Canadas produced an immediate effect. The British government decided to carry out his suggestion at once and a bill was introduced in June 1839 for that purpose. Opposition was strong, however, in Upper Canada, and the house of assembly, while approving of the plan, laid down conditions which the imperial parliament could not accept.¹ The measure was therefore postponed until the new governor-general, Charles Poulett Thomson, afterwards Baron Sydenham of Sydenham and Toronto, had gone to Canada and made a full report on the provinces. Thomson was a civilian who had had a wide financial and business experience, and he brought to his work a nervous energy and a tenacity of purpose which surprised men who were intimately acquainted with him. A liberal in politics, he had the entire confidence of Lord John Russell, and the combination in colonial administration tided Canada over one of the most difficult periods in its history and, as the issues proved, laid permanent foundations for constitutional development. Thomson landed at Quebec on October 19, 1839, and at once began his work, which may be considered as two-fold. First it was his duty to gain Canadian adherence to the imperial proposal, and secondly he was to deal with a constitutional principle which would inevitably crop up—the problem of ‘responsible government’.

His instructions covering these main duties and lesser subjects were contained in three dispatches from Lord John Russell.¹ He was to promote 'a legislative union of the two provinces—a just regard to the claims of either province in adjusting the terms of that union—the maintenance of the three estates of the provincial legislature—the settlement of a permanent civil list for securing the independence of the judges, and to the executive government that freedom of action which is necessary for the public good—and the establishment of a system of local government by representative bodies freely elected in the various cities and rural districts'. In order to carry the assembly of Upper Canada he was, if necessary, to dissolve it and appeal to the good sense of the inhabitants. On the subject of responsible government Russell's instructions disclose the fact that he had continued to grapple with the problem. He felt that such a constitutional principle could not be reduced to the form of a positive enactment, but he counselled a course which was a distinct advance: 'The importance of maintaining the utmost possible harmony between the policy of the legislature and of the executive government admits of no question, and it will of course be your anxious endeavour to call to your councils and to employ in the public service those persons who, by their position and character, have obtained the general confidence and esteem of the inhabitants of the province.' On the other hand, he could not see the way clear towards the establishment of full cabinet government: 'if we seek to apply such a practice to a colony we shall at once find ourselves at fault. The power for which a minister is responsible in England is not his own power, but the power of the crown, of which he is for the time the organ. It is obvious that the executive councillor of a colony is in a situation totally different. The governor under whom he serves received his orders from the crown of England. But can the colonial council be the advisers of the crown of ¹ Russell to Thomson, September 7, October 14, 16, 1839, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 516 ff.

¹ Cf. Kennedy, op. cit., p. 531, and see G. Poulett Scrope, Memoir of the Life of the Right Honourable Charles, Lord Sydenham, with a Narrative of his Administration in Canada, p. 152 (second ed., London, 1844).

England ? Evidently not, for the crown has other advisers for the same functions and with superior authority. It may happen, therefore, that the governor receives at one and the same time instructions from the queen and advice from his executive council totally at variance with each other. If he is to obey his instructions from England, the parallel of constitutional responsibility entirely fails ; if, on the other hand, he is to follow the advice of his council, he is no longer a subordinate officer, but an independent sovereign.' Russell's principle was to be one of mutual harmony between executive and legislature, depending neither on an enactment nor on a convention, but on good sense and ' a wise moderation '. To encourage the idea he instructed Thomson to make it generally known that in future good behaviour would not be considered a guarantee that an office which was held during pleasure would be held during life : ' Not only will such officers be called to retire from the public service as often as any sufficient motives of public policy may suggest the expediency of that measure, but . . . a change in the person of the governor will be considered as a sufficient reason for any alterations which his successor may deem it expedient to make in the list of public functionaries, subject of course to the future confirmation of the sovereign.' Thomson was in thorough agreement with the policies outlined, and at once began to put them to the test.

On November 11 he summoned at Montreal the special council which had acted under Sir John Colborne. His shrewdness was immediately apparent. He did not intend to make any changes nor to call a council of which he chose the members. His object was to escape the imputation of creating a body specially selected because of their favouring the project of union.¹ Nor did he intend to tolerate disorganized proceedings as under Colborne—' his council ran riot '. He laid the project of union before the body, gave them his ' opinion strongly ', and carried his proposals.¹ The council accepted the union in six resolutions, which included agreement with the request for a civil list and for the blending of the public debts of the provinces. They urged at the same time the reprovizion of constitutional government as quickly as possible.² Thomson believed that the majority of the province, British and French, were behind him, arbitrary though the methods were which the law allowed him to use under the temporary Acts for the administration of Lower Canada. In his heart, however, he was convinced that such methods were ideal for the province: 'If it were possible the best thing for Lower Canada would be a despotism for ten years more, for in truth the people are not yet fit for the higher class of self-government—scarcely indeed at present for any description of it'.³ Before long, too, he changed his mind about the approval which he thought he had behind him. In Lower Canada he found 'no such thing as a political opinion. No man looks to a practical measure of improvement. Talk to any one upon education, or public works, or better laws, let him be English or French, you might as well talk Greek to him. Not a man cares for a single practical measure—the only end, one would suppose, of a better form of government. They have only one feeling, a hatred of race. The French hate the English and the English hate the French, and every question resolves itself into that and that alone.'⁴ The council might accept the union, but in the final analysis their resolutions were imposed on them by the arbitrary will of the governor. They reflected, broadly speaking, only that will. Thomson's greatest failure lay in thinking that the race feeling which he so vividly described would lie down quietly under a form of government which provided it with anything like freedom. If it was true, as he professed to believe, that the great mass of the people held

¹ Thomson to Russell, November 18, 1839, Kennedy, op. cit., p. 525.

¹ Same to a friend, November 20, December 8, 1839, ibid., p. 528.

² Ibid., pp. 527 ff.

³ See note 1.

⁴ Thomson to a friend, March 13, 1840, Scrope, op. cit., p. 168.

an opinion 'in favour of the union measure', then it was equally true, as he failed to see, that their favour was influenced by racial motives.

In Upper Canada there was no chance of gaining the consent of the legislature by high-handed methods. When Thomson met it early in December 1839, he disclosed the political skill in which he gradually became a past master. His first address to the house of assembly was exceedingly well planned. He laid stress on the financial state of the province—the stagnation in public and private affairs, the heavy provincial debt. A larger revenue was needed, not merely to cancel the past but to secure the future. Lower Canada had always been a financial stumbling-block to Upper Canada. Lower Canada held the key to more revenue, and without Lower Canadian co-operation navigation and the development of natural resources must remain futile. The imperial government were glad that the house of assembly had previously agreed to the principle of union, and it only remained for the governor-general to ask them to moderate their conditions and to accept others which would hasten those changes towards improvement which Upper Canada so much needed and desired. Thomson outlined the imperial terms: equal representation of each province in the united legislature, a sufficient civil list, the placing as a charge on the United Province a fair proportion of the existing public debt of Upper Canada which had been contracted on works of a general nature.¹

The address was masterly, and it worked like magic on a house of assembly of which Thomson has left a lively picture: 'The assembly is such a house—split into half a dozen parties. The government having none—and no one man to depend on. Think of a house in which half the members hold places, yet in which the government does not command a single vote; in which the place-men generally vote against the executive, and where there is no one to defend the government when attacked or to state the opinions or views of the governor. How with a popular assembly government is to be conducted under such circumstances is a riddle to me.’¹ Thomson’s address was the first move in solving the riddle. ‘The wise moderation’ which was Russell’s elixir of political life was brought into action in the appeal to the hard common sense of the province. The gate to prosperity was closed and the key to it was legislative union. More skilful still was the publication in the Upper Canada Gazette of the dispatch relating to the tenure of public offices. It was unaccompanied by any explanatory note. The new rule was self-evident—no one would be continued as a public official unless he was of service to the governor and to the province. The strategy was astounding. Thomson had already begun his method of government. The session was scarcely three weeks old when he carried his proposals with substantial majorities in both the legislative council and in the house of assembly.² In informing Russell of his success, his dispatches were almost exuberant. He had neglected the ‘family compact’ and the office-holders, and he had made his appeal to the reformers and moderate conservatives.³ The union was carried, but not ‘without trouble and a prodigious deal of management, in which my house of commons tactics stood me in good stead, for I wanted above all things to avoid a dissolution. My ministers vote against me. So I govern through the opposition, who are truly “her majesty’s”.’⁴

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 529 ff.

¹ Ibid., p. 529.

² Ibid., pp. 532 ff.

³ Thomson to Russell, December 24, 1839, Scrope, op. cit., pp. 154 ff.

⁴ Thomson to a friend, December 31, 1839, ibid., p. 156. In an interview with Sir George Arthur, the lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada, November 24, 1839, on the question of gaining Upper Canadian support for the union, Thomson left the clear impression that his object was to secure ten or twelve years of good government, and that by that time ‘ministers hoped to find a convenient opportunity of dropping the connexion’, since the Canadas would have developed ‘the groundwork of an independent state separate from the neighbouring republic’: Memo. of confidential interview

A week before he had gained the assent of the assembly, the question of 'responsible government' was raised, and Thomson was asked for any dispatches which he might have received on the subject. His tactful answer gained him support. He lightly brushed aside his inability to communicate the dispatches to the house, but he informed them that he had been commanded to administer the government 'in accordance with the well-understood wishes and interests of the people, and to pay to their feelings, as expressed through their representatives, the deference that is justly due to them'.¹ This was generally interpreted to mean that at least the old colonial system was dead. Indeed Robert Baldwin stated to the electors of Toronto before the union his 'conviction that the great principle of responsible government as we have always claimed it . . . is effectually conceded'.² Thomson, however, had arrived at a method of administration which was peculiarly his own. His aim was to destroy that idea of 'responsible government' which at this time Baldwin thought had been conceded. He was a minister, not a sovereign, and his executive council could not be responsible to the assembly, for he was not in a position uniformly to accept their advice: 'I cannot get rid of my responsibility to the home government, I will place no responsibility on the council; they are a council for the governor to consult, but no more.'³ He determined to lead the people of these colonies 'from fruitless and idle disputes upon theoretical points of government'.⁴ He aimed to avoid belonging to one party or to the other, and 'to take the moderate men from both sides, reject the extremes, and govern as [he thought] between G. G. and Sir George Arthur in Macaulay Papers [A], E. 45 a, 6 (15) (Ontario Archives).

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., p. 536.

² Baldwin to the electors of Toronto, January 16, 1841, Baldwin Papers [A], E. 6-7, 29 (17) (Ontario Archives).

³ Thomson to a friend, December 12, 1839, Kennedy, op. cit., p. 532.

⁴ Same to citizens of Halifax, July 1840, Scrope, op. cit., p. 179.

right and not as they fancy'. 'I can make a middle reforming party, I feel sure,' he wrote in the utmost confidence.¹ Thomson was as much a party leader as any preceding governors, but he created his party. He chose the best men of all shades of moderate opinion. He would 'devolve the responsibility of his acts on no man', for he believed such a course would endanger the empire; but he was always ready to listen to all opinions and 'to seek the advice of those who may be considered to represent the well-understood wishes of the people'.²

Thomson at once proceeded to put his system to further test. He had formulated a theory of responsibility. The problem now was to see if the latter would work in another relation where the imperial wishes were not so clearly defined. He took a moment when his popularity was at its height to 'try his hand at the clergy reserves'.³ In the church lands he saw perhaps the most disintegrating force in the social background of Upper Canada. They had stirred up religious bitterness, broken up the economic life of the province, and reacted detrimentally on the administration. He hoped to get some satisfactory arrangement through the legislature before the united parliament opened. To remove such a source of discontent seemed more than wise, for there were enough difficulties ahead along the new path of constitutional progress. With the clergy reserves unsettled, he felt that no constitution, however new and however constitutionally accepted, would make for either advance or content. In addition, Thomson, like Durham, was a strong imperialist. He diagnosed with concern a certain unrest, an impatience with England's colonial policy, a state of mind not explicitly disloyal, but certainly not sympathetic towards the dealings with the Canadas. There was a danger, if the union did not get away to a good start, that all this might be fatally accentuated. He therefore determined to see if Upper Canada itself could not settle the clergy reserves question. He risked his previous success, and he stood to gain nothing with the British government if he accomplished his purpose. Indeed he might irretrievably damage his reputation. On the other hand, there never had been such a favourable moment to take a risk for the benefit of the province.

¹ Ibid., p. 164.

² Ibid., p. 259.

³ Ibid., p. 155.

Thomson was personally opposed to a solution which would turn over the clergy reserves to education, and the legislative council had all along rejected such a proposal. He could not bring himself to sanction the transference to any other object of lands granted for a religious purpose, and he believed any bill to that effect would be disallowed by the imperial cabinet. There were two extreme opinions in the province. The vast majority of the people favoured a settlement for education. Strachan and his group held fast by the belief that they were 'the protestant clergy' of the Constitutional Act. Thomson prepared a bill which went through the legislature as a compromise. The clergy reserves were to be distributed among the various religious bodies in proportion to their membership. The bill was suspended until it had lain before the British parliament and received special approval from the crown according to the terms of the Constitutional Act.¹ Meanwhile Thomson was triumphant. In spite of Strachan's bitter opposition he felt that he had removed 'the great overwhelming grievance, the root of all the troubles of the province, the cause of the rebellion—the never-failing watchword at the hustings—the perpetual source of discord, strife, and hatred . . . it is worth ten unions'.² Unfortunately legal opinion decided that the provincial legislature could not deal with the matter and his bill was disallowed. An imperial Act was passed along the same lines, but Strachan had been busy and the church of England received a share out of all proportion to its numerical importance. Thomson was naturally offended. The new arrangement would only aggravate the evil. However, there were compensations.

¹ See above, p. 83.

² Scrope, op. cit., pp. 160 ff.

No new reserves could be created, lands sold in the past were divided between the church of England and the church of Scotland, and the monies derived from sales in the future would be divided in a general way among all the religious bodies on a basis of membership. Thomson's fears were for the moment groundless, and his personal popularity quieted a people of whom the vast majority felt that the imperial legislation had done another injustice to Canada. He closed the last legislature of Upper Canada with just pride. 'On your return to your different districts', he said, 'I earnestly hope that it will be your endeavour to promote that spirit of harmony and conciliation which has so much distinguished your proceedings here. Let past differences be forgotten—let irritating suspicions be removed. I rejoice to find that already tranquillity and hopeful confidence in the future prevail throughout the province. Let it be your task to cherish and promote these feelings; it will be mine cordially to co-operate with you, and by administering the government in obedience to the commands of the queen, with justice and impartiality to all, to promote her anxious wish that her Canadian subjects, loyal to their sovereign and attached to British institutions, may, through the blessing of Divine Providence, become a happy, an united, and a prosperous people.' His personal letters were full of the closing scenes: 'I have prorogued my parliament . . . never was such unanimity. When the speaker read [the speech] to the commons, after the prorogation, they gave me three cheers, in which even the ultras united. In fact, as the matter now stands, the province is in a state of peace and harmony which three months ago I thought was utterly hopeless.'¹ There certainly had not been such a scene since Simcoe opened the first legislature.

Thomson's success had been phenomenal, but his strong-willed vitality would not allow him to rest. He saw the constitutional break-down of the past outlined against a background of everyday life. His dealings with the clergy reserves illustrate his hold on the situation. He was not content with a theoretical reform of the functioning of institutions. He realized that institutions were not miraculous, and that they were only vital when they worked for a people and expressed a social consciousness. He desired then to create as many favourable conditions as possible for the union not only in the Canadas but in British North America. Friction in the other provinces would react on the Canadas, and he feared any neighbouring constitutional struggle until they had been given a chance to secure their footing. The history of the year immediately preceding the union may not be one of intense importance, but it is a real illustration of the governor's purposeful grasp of the intimate relationship between social life and institutional life, of his conception of colonial government as a whole, and of his personal administrative system.

¹ Ibid., p. 164.

In Lower Canada there was chaos. 'There is positively no machinery of government,' he wrote; 'everything is to be done by the governor and his secretary. There are no heads of departments at all, or none whom one can depend on, or even get at; for most of them are still at Quebec, and it is difficult to move them up [to Montreal] because there are no public buildings. The wise system hitherto adopted has been to stick two men into some office whenever a vacancy occurred—one Frenchman and one Britisher! Thus we have joint crown surveyors, joint sheriffs, &c., each opposing the other in everything he attempts. Can you conceive a system better calculated to countenance the distinction of race? . . . The hand of the government is utterly unknown and unfelt at present out of Montreal and Quebec, and not the slightest means exist of knowing what is passing in the rural districts.'¹ Before such a state of affairs Thomson almost lost heart, as he knew that many of the needed reforms would require parliamentary legislation. He proceeded to gather up, as it were, as many loose ends as he could. The French-Canadians were a fact, and he approached their ostensible leader, Louis Hippolyte La Fontaine, and offered him the office of solicitor-general of Lower Canada, at the same time fully acquainting him with his political ideas and methods. There was diplomacy. La Fontaine was a violent opponent of the union, and Thomson hoped to detach him from the opposition and to secure his abilities for the future province. La Fontaine refused. This was Thomson's first rebuff; but in reality it was a triumph, for he had made a public confession of desiring to work with the French-Canadians. However, he was far from cheerful: 'As for the French, nothing but time will do anything for them. They hate British rule—British connexions—improvements of all kinds, whether in their laws or in their roads; so they will sulk, and will try, that is, their leaders, to do all the mischief they can.'¹ In the special council his power was practically supreme, and he prepared and carried through ordinances of much importance. He heard with dismay that Russell had not included municipal clauses in the Act of Union.² 'No man in his senses', he wrote, 'would think for a moment of the union without its being accompanied by some sort of local government, in which the people may control their own officers and the executive at the same time obtain some influence in the country districts. Without a breakwater of this kind between the central government and the people, government with an assembly is impossible in Lower Canada, and most difficult in Upper Canada.'³ He organized a municipal system for the lower province which still remains the foundation of local government in modern Quebec. His motive was not single. He knew when he proposed a similar system for Upper Canada that the fact that Lower Canada already possessed local government would be a strong force in his favour. Lastly, he passed an ordinance for the establishment of registry offices. Perhaps nothing had been so detrimental to development in Lower Canada as the extraordinary laxness of mortgage regulations and the want of facilities for finding out the incumbrances on a piece of land. Settlement had been retarded, the unsuspecting had been deluded and even the wary taken in. The legislature had tried in vain to improve matters, and Thomson was determined not to leave the subject any longer open. He drove through 'a registry bill—the "asses' bridge" of the province for the last twenty years—which [met] with nearly universal assent from both French and English'.¹ Broadly speaking, however, the French-Canadians remained suspicious and had little sympathy with Thomson's activities. They hung back from his advances under the threatening shadows of Durham's Report, and he laboured under no delusions. He summed up their state of mind to Russell: 'The French-Canadians have forgotten nothing and learnt nothing by the rebellion and the suspension of the constitution, and are more unfit for representative government than they were in 1791 . . . actuated by the old spirit of the assembly and without any principle except that of inveterate hostility to British rule and British connexion.'² The union would begin with a hostile French Canada.

¹ Scrope, op. cit., pp. 168 ff.

¹ Ibid., op. cit., p. 191.

² Thomson to Russell, September 16, 1840, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 551 ff., and Russell to Thomson, October 25, 1840, ibid., pp. 554 ff.

³ Thomson to a friend (1840 ?), ibid., p. 555. Cf. Durham Report, ii, p. 287.

In Upper Canada there was little that could be done in the way of actual measures, but Thomson secured the province by two methods. Firstly, he let it be known that he was preparing new plans relating to immigration, the simplification of the land system, the advance of public works, and the floating of a huge loan to be arranged by the imperial parliament. His knowledge of human nature told him that, quite apart from urgency in these matters, he was making an appeal which would touch a practical spot in the hearts of Upper Canadians. Secondly, he toured the province practically as a party leader. This tour is perhaps the key to his system. It was the triumphant progress of benevolent despotism, which depends for its stability on popular support. He took every opportunity to receive addresses, and in reply to explain the magnificent future which lay before the country if sanity, good feeling, and unity were allowed to prevail. His own words best sum up his success : ‘ *All parties uniting in addresses at every place, full of confidence in my government, and of a determination to forget their former disputes. Escorts of two and three hundred farmers on horseback at every place from township to township, with all the etceteras of guns, music, and flags. What is of more importance, my candidates everywhere taken for the ensuing elections ; in short, such unanimity and confidence I never saw, and it augurs well for the future. Even the Toronto people, who have been spending the last six weeks in squabbling, were led, I suppose by the feeling shown in the rest of the province, into giving me a splendid reception and took in good part a lecture I read them, telling them that they had better follow the good example of peace and renewed harmony which had been set them elsewhere, instead of making a piece of work about what they did not understand. The fact is that the truth of my original notion of the people and of this country is now confirmed. The mass only wanted the vigorous interference of a well-intentioned government, strong enough to control both the extreme parties, and to proclaim wholesome truths, and act for the benefit of the country at large, in defiance of ultras on either side.*’¹ It is impossible not to recall the political activities of Francis Gore and Sir Francis Bond Head, when they placed themselves at the head of actual local parties. Thomson did not discard their methods, but he knew a better way. He created a party on whose platform the governor-general—representative of the crown and responsible to the imperial cabinet—and Charles Edward Poulett Thomson, Upper Canadian reformer, could meet. Meanwhile theories of government took care of themselves, and the constituencies accepted his candidates.

¹ Thomson to a friend, November 23, 1840, Scrope, op. cit., p. 198.

² Same to Russell, February 26, 1841, State Papers, G. 391, pp. 168 ff.

¹ Thomson to a friend, September 18, 1840, Scrope, op. cit., p. 190.

Echoes of a 'mighty storm in a very small ocean'¹ reached him from Nova Scotia. Lord John Russell's dispatch on the tenure of public offices produced different results in the Maritime Provinces. In New Brunswick Sir John Harvey announced his intention of following it implicitly, and there was thus eliminated any acute transition to responsible government. In Nova Scotia, however, Sir Colin Campbell made no effort to reform an executive council in which the assembly had practically no confidence. Joseph Howe forced the issue and carried a resolution in the assembly which declared that 'the executive council, as at present constituted, does not enjoy the confidence of the commons'. He convinced James Boyle Uniacke, the government leader in the assembly and the future first reform premier in Nova Scotia. The lieutenant-governor did not move in spite of Uniacke's desertion, and answered the resolutions in vague and non-committal terms. Howe carried further resolutions and asked Campbell to carry on the government according to the wishes of the people. No advance was possible, because Campbell would not or could not see the force of Russell's formula. He affected to believe that agreement with the address would bring about a fundamental constitutional change which Russell could not have intended. Howe fell back on an implication from Glenelg's theory of responsibility.² If the governor had a real responsibility 'to his majesty and to parliament', and if they were ready 'to devote a patient and laborious attention' to any representations which might be addressed to them from the colonies, had the time not come for such complaints in Nova Scotia ? He carried an address to the queen which contained a famous petition : ‘that your majesty will join with this house in obviating the necessity for such appeals—that you will repress these absurd attempts to govern provinces by the aid and for the exclusive benefit of minorities, this assembly confidently believes ; and in asking your majesty to remove Sir Colin Campbell and send to Nova Scotia a governor who will not only represent the crown, but carry out its policy with firmness and good faith, the representatives of Nova Scotia perform a faithful duty to their sovereign and to their constituents, but recommend the only remedy which they fear can now be applied to establish harmony between the executive and legislature of this province.’ The boldness of the demand was astonishing, and a public agitation arose in which Howe fanned the agitation for popular government into a white heat. The imperial government entrusted the settlement to Thomson, as Nova Scotia came within the scope of his commission, and left him full discretion to deal with the issues. On his arrival at Halifax, he instinctively grasped the situation and within a fortnight his recommendations were on their way to England. The executive council must be reformed to include ‘only the leading official servants of the government and a few of the most influential members of either house—but especially those of the house of assembly’. All members of the executive council who were not members of either house must be removed, and the law officers of the crown and other public servants should when necessary become members of the assembly as well as of the executive council. The legislative council must be opened to representation from the popular party. Thomson formed a high opinion of the province and praised its adherence to constitutionalism. Campbell was removed to make room for Lord Falkland, who attempted to apply to Nova Scotia Thomson’s system.¹

¹ Thomson to Russell, July 27, 1840, Scrope, op. cit., p. 180.

² Kennedy, op. cit., p. 419.

¹ Scrope, op. cit., pp. 175 ff.

Meanwhile the Act ¹ for the reunion of the Canadas had passed the imperial parliament and Thomson had been raised to the peerage in recognition of his services. He must henceforth appear in the history as Baron Sydenham of Sydenham and Toronto. It is hardly necessary to analyse the Act in detail. The two provinces were to be formed, by proclamation, into one province of Canada within fifteen months after the passing of the Act. The general scheme of government was little changed. There was erected one legislative council, members of which held office for life on good behaviour, and one house of assembly, the members of which were to consist of an equal number from each old province and must possess property worth at least £500. Provision was made for altering 'the apportionment of the number of representatives'. The speaker of the council was to be nominated by the governor, and of the assembly to be elected by its members. The status of the church of England, of the Roman catholic church, of waste lands, and of religious toleration was clearly defined. Arrangements were made for a consolidated fund out of which the expenses of the judiciary, government, and pensions might be paid. The rest of the revenue was placed at the disposal of the united legislature, which assumed the debts of the two old provinces. Appropriation and taxation must originate with the governor, and were then open to discussion in the house of assembly. The laws in force in either division were to continue until repealed or amended. All written and printed documents relating to the council and assembly and all proceedings of either house were to be in English. Translation of documents and papers into French was allowed. Lord John Russell explained that this section only dealt with English as the language of 'original record'. There was nothing in the Act against French as the language of debate, and it was used as such from the time of the first united parliament.²

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 536 ff. (3 & 4 Victoria, c. 35).

² The first speaker was a French-Canadian. Rules were adopted for

A proclamation brought the union into force on February 10, 1841, and in April the first elections were held, with the result that there were six groups varying in numbers from a 'family compact' party of seven to a 'government' party of twenty-four. The 'French party' was computed at twenty and that of the 'Moderate Reformers' at the same figure.¹ The nomenclature, however, is purely arbitrary and there was no severe group adhesion. 'A ministerial crisis',² as Sydenham described it, occurred on the eve of the opening of the legislature.³ Sydenham appointed a 'ministry' which he intended as a coalition of the English parties, and included W. H. Draper, a conservative, as attorney-general for Canada West, and Robert Baldwin the reformer as solicitor-general for Canada West. The French were to be neglected. Baldwin was careful to explain that he had not come in by means of any coalition with the attorney-general or with any one else. He believed that in accepting public office at all he gave a public pledge that the government of the country would be carried on according to the principles of 'responsible government' which he had ever held, and he accepted office with that idea under the governor-general. When chosen for ministerial office in United Canada, he informed Sydenham that he had only confidence in three of his colleagues. The results of the elections gave to the ultra-reformers of Canada West only five seats, and Baldwin saw a solid and well-organized French group returned. Before parliament met private negotiations were carried on between the two parties, and Baldwin was recognized as leader of a United Reform party, which represented the opinions of the majority procedure in the assembly. No. 29 provided for the translation of papers, &c., and No. 38 provided for the reading of a motion in both French and English: Standing Rules and Regulations of the Legislative Assembly of Canada (Kingston, 1841).

¹ Scrope, op. cit., p. 217.

² Ibid., p. 233.

³ The history of the Baldwin episode is told in the fullest detail in J. L. Morison, British Supremacy and Canadian Self-government, 1839-54, pp. 109 ff. (Glasgow, 1919).

of the electors and could control the house. Acting logically Baldwin desired to bring the executive council into harmony with the United Reformers, and he pointed out to Sydenham that four councillors could not be considered as sympathetic. It was tantamount to a request that the governor should remove them, and it was the challenge of a thorough and consistent believer in cabinet government to Sydenham's half-way house. Baldwin could not accept a principle which would allow the governor to neglect party affiliations, however indistinct, by choosing ministers at will from any or all the political groups. The United Reformers were in the majority, and the logic of British precedent to which Baldwin uniformly adhered demanded, firstly, that the council should reflect entirely their opinions, and secondly that French-Canadians should be admitted to it. There was nothing for Sydenham to do, if his whole administrative methods were to escape destruction, except to deny the logic of Baldwin's position. To cabinet government he was a convinced opponent, and Baldwin disappeared from office under a rebuke of unambiguous severity, while echoes of the crisis reached England in dispatches full of contemptuous wrath.

To describe adequately Sydenham's legislature would need a graphic pen. Behind everything was the irrepressible governor, as autocratic as any of his predecessors, but convinced that his means justified his ends. He has left a vivid picture of the opening days: 'I have got the large majority of the house ready to support me upon any question that can arise, and, what is better, thoroughly convinced that their constituents, so far as the whole of Upper Canada and the British part of Lower Canada are concerned, will never forgive them if they do not. Whoever follows me now may, with management, keep everything quiet and rule with comfort. . . . We have discussed all the great topics—the union, responsible government, the parliamentary conditions of the Union Act, confidence in the administration—every subject on which excitement might have been raised, and the agitators have entirely and signally failed. Except the rump of the old house of assembly of Lower Canada and two or three ultra-radicals who have gone over with my solicitor-general, whom I have got rid of, every member is cordially with me and my government.'¹ He soon found that every move had to be carefully watched. All day and far into the night he worked not merely with papers and projects but with men and minds. No prime minister, no party whip could have been more active, more open to interviews, more adaptable to circumstances, more free in personal intercourse. Bored to death with ceremonial and bowing and the 'misery of always being on parade', he worked like a party-leader obsessed with a platform, and like a reformer obsessed with a mission. In the game which he played the members of the legislature were mere pawns on the board, mere pieces to hoodwink the theorists. He did not believe that the old hospital at Kingston where his parliament met was the home of Canadian healing. He looked out beyond its walls to the average citizen who wanted peace, content, and above all a slower process of change. His majority was the heart and soul of common-sense citizens. Doubtless he had no intention of being forced to dissolve, and he bent his energies to obtain parliamentary majorities with the zeal of an old lobbyist. He was not afraid to rely on the veto of the legislative council. But he knew his goal, the extent of his purpose, and the tremendous necessity of carrying on. He kept his legislature busy on measures which would make him more powerful than ever throughout the country. The foundations of common school education were laid. A board of works was established in the hope that private members might refrain from jobbing the public funds. The customs laws were revised in the direction of commercial enterprise and increased revenue. He outlined a scheme of public works on which the new loan guaranteed by the imperial cabinet might be most efficiently spent. He succeeded in getting a measure of local government through against a combination of conservatives and radicals. The former opposed it because it brought a further measure of self-government into the province, the latter because the district wardens were appointed by the crown.¹ In legislation for banking he failed. The private banks were too strong, and he had to abandon his scheme for a national bank with a monopoly in the issuing of notes. It is worth while drawing attention to the practical nature of his bills. Sydenham was a business man using a legislature for business ends. He was putting goods that were in demand on the provincial market, and he was convinced that if the personnel of his establishment failed him, there were more than enough men in Canada who would break the strike.

¹ Scrope, op. cit., p. 233.

With all his skill he could not ward off a discussion which he considered dangerous on those 'theoretical points of government'. Towards the end of the session Baldwin moved for copies of Lord John Russell's dispatches on responsible government, and these were laid on the table by Samuel Bealey Harrison. On September 3 Baldwin moved six resolutions which were seconded by a French-Canadian member: '(1) That the most important as well as the most undoubted of the political rights of the people of this province is that of having a provincial parliament for the protection of their liberties, for the exercise of their constitutional influence over the executive departments of their government, and for legislation upon all matters which do not, on the grounds of absolute necessity, constitutionally belong to the jurisdiction of the imperial parliament as the paramount authority of the empire. (2) That the head of the provincial executive government of the province, being within the limits of his government the representative of the sovereign, is not constitutionally responsible to any other than the authorities of the empire. (3) That the representative of the sovereign for the proper conduct and efficient disposal of the public business is necessarily obliged to make use of the advice and assistance of subordinate officers in the administration of his government. (4) That in order to preserve that harmony between the different branches of the provincial parliament which is essential to the happy conduct of public affairs, the principal of such subordinate officers, advisers of the representative of the sovereign and constituting as such the provincial administration under him as the head of the provincial government, ought always to be men possessed of the public confidence, whose opinions and policy harmonizing with those of the representatives of the people would afford a guarantee that the well-understood wishes and interests of the people, which our gracious sovereign has declared shall be the rule of the provincial government,¹ will at all times be faithfully represented to the head of that government and through him to the sovereign and imperial parliament. (5) That as it is practically always optional with such advisers to continue in or to retire from office at pleasure, this house has the constitutional right of holding such advisers politically responsible for every act of the provincial government of a local character, sanctioned by such government while such advisers continue in office. (6) That for the like reason this house has the constitutional right of holding such advisers in like manner responsible for using, while they continue in office, their best exertions to procure from the imperial authorities the exercise of their right of dealing with such matters affecting the interests of the province as constitutionally belong to those authorities in the manner most consistent with the well-understood wishes and interests of the people of this province.²

¹ Sydenham to his brother, August 28, 1841, Kennedy, op. cit., p. 563.

Baldwin's resolutions were founded on two ideas. Firstly, on the distinction made by Durham and Howe between executive authority over imperial and over colonial concerns—a distinction which Russell had taught Sydenham was invalid : secondly, on cabinet responsibility in colonial affairs—a convention which Sydenham could not accept because of Russell's instructions. To allow the resolutions to pass would be granting permission to a colonial assembly to revoke imperial dispatches already on the table of the house, and would be conceding that the method of government which the governor had followed was not that implied in those dispatches. Sydenham therefore drew up or inspired four amendments, which were moved by Harrison :¹

¹ See above, p. 188.

² Kennedy, op. cit., p. 564.

‘(1) That the most important as well as the most undoubted of the political rights of the people of this province is that of having a provincial parliament for the protection of their liberties, for the exercise of a constitutional influence over the executive departments of their government, and for legislation upon all matters of internal government. (2) That the head of the executive government of the province, being within the limits of his government the representative of the sovereign, is responsible to the imperial authority alone ; but that, nevertheless, the management of our local affairs can only be conducted by him, by and with the assistance, counsel, and information of subordinate officers in the province. (3) That in order to preserve between the different branches of the provincial parliament that harmony which is essential to the peace, welfare, and good government of the province, the chief advisers of the representative of the sovereign, constituting a provincial administration under him, ought to be men possessed of the confidence of the representatives of the people, thus affording a guarantee that the well-understood wishes and interests of the people, which our gracious sovereign has declared shall be the rule of the provincial government, will, on all occasions, be faithfully represented and advocated. (4) That the people of the province have, moreover, a right to expect from such provincial administration the exertion of their best endeavours that the imperial authority within its constitutional limits shall be exercised in the manner most consistent with their well-understood wishes and interests.' ¹ These amendments, which were adopted, represent the furthest point to which Sydenham felt that he could go. In less than three weeks his hands fell from the helm of state. He died at Kingston September 19, 1841.

¹ Serope, op. cit., pp. 236, 259.

Sydenham's system of government is easy to state. He was governor and prime minister in one. He could never be responsible to a local cabinet as long as he was an imperial officer, but he could so follow and guide local opinion that it would not clash with his duties and would produce such general satisfaction as would eliminate constitutional theories. His great solvent was work in a practical direction. He kept his legislature so busy on beneficial measures that they had neither the time nor the energy to persist in worrying him with abstract questions. He recognized a local responsibility which none of his predecessors would concede. It was not cabinet responsibility, but it was one of common sense. An intelligent people do not want wilfully to wreck their state. Sydenham deliberately catered to that fundamental human fact, and he did it in such a way that the electors believed he was carrying out their wishes. In the house of assembly he gradually gained the support of moderate practical men. He may have doctored the electoral divisions to gain support. He may have planned further doctoring. The fact remains he succeeded, and he must be judged by his success. He began when the Canadas were without form and void, and he carried out a work of creation. It is extremely probable that if he had conceded Baldwin's demands in the summer of 1841, there would have been another political débâcle. He refused French Canada. It was perhaps providential that he did so. Had French-Canadians come in in 1841, there would have been no lessons learned. La Fontaine would have led a group of doctrinaire demagogues, who had not acquired any grip on constitutional reform. Canada East needed Sydenham's silent rebuke. In addition, the Canadas had no constitutional organization. Parliamentary procedure was more like that in a rustic debating society than in a responsible legislature. There was no system, no method, no administrative insight, no civil service. The union was all very well, but sixty-two sections of even an imperial act never yet saved a province. Sydenham's great work was the recognition that neither constitutional theory nor constitutional fact works automatically. The rigidity of the eighteenth-century constitution on the one hand and the elasticity of cabinet government on the other could not produce content in the Canadas. What the people of the Canadas needed was organized concrete direction rather than constitutional space. Sydenham gave them what they needed. For the theory—he was the queen's servant, the council must be his servants. Behind the theory, the elemental human fact that all government is based on consent. He succeeded in combining the autocratic and the popular. In fact he would have repudiated the former epithet. He was the father of his people, the shepherd of his flock, and circumstances made for his success.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 564-5.

It is impossible, however, to leave Sydenham's work without more searching criticism. He took terrific risks: what if he had failed? Perhaps the nearest answer to that question will be found in the Campbell-Howe episode. Sydenham approved the address for Campbell's recall, and he would have been prepared perhaps to leave the Canadas by a similar method. That, of course, might work where there was obvious unwillingness to carry out imperial orders. But had Sydenham failed to carry the assembly with him, had they said that in spite of goodwill, practical measures, business administration, they wanted to be masters in their own colonial house, there is no evidence that he had any answer to a situation which might easily have arisen. There is evidence, however, that he was overdoing his paternalism, and that the sheep were getting to know the paddock. It is extremely doubtful if he could have held his parliament together for another session. Indeed, the French were kind to him, and the volcano of racial hate was quiet enough and certainly quieter than it might have been. He did a necessary work, by nature transitory. That is rather a pathetic summary, but it is in truth praise. Sydenham came with a definite mission—to establish organization, political methods, and administrative machinery; to point out that government can gain popular approval without losing self-respect, and that respect for authority is the foundation of citizenship. Sydenham fulfilled his mission. It was a typically Anglo-Saxon mission. No high flights, no great dramatic moments, no pomp and circumstance of glory, no magnificent fame. He stepped off the stage, his work done, his method in reality dying with him.

On the other hand, when his successor, Sir Charles Bagot, looked back after a few months' interval on Sydenham's régime, he probed to the very depths and found failure. Bagot's estimate is all the more important in forming a judicial opinion because it is that of a man whose correspondence discloses honesty, wisdom, and balance, and because it was made at a moment when it was possible to fix some of the conditions which are so elusive, and whose loss renders historical criticism weak and insecure. Writing to Lord Stanley a confidential dispatch, Bagot said: 'I have given a general sketch of Lord Sydenham's policy—were I further to lift the thin veil of success which covers it, much of deformity would be found underneath. Towards the French-Canadians his conduct was very unwise. He made enemies of them unnecessarily at a time when he should have propitiated them and diminished their objections to the union. He treated those who approached him with slight and rudeness, and thus he converted a proud and courageous people, which even their detractors acknowledge them to be, into personal and irreconcilable enemies. He despised their talents and denied their official capacity for office. In this respect he was mainly right ; but there was the lesser reason for fearing their power when held in check and for endeavouring further to weaken it by measures which will not stand the test of justice. Such, for instance, was the cutting off the suburbs from the electoral districts of Quebec and Montreal. His alleged reason was to give a commercial representation to these two towns ;¹ his real reason, well known to his council, was to secure the exclusion of the French from the representation and the acquisition of four supporters to his government. The first point he gained, but not the latter, as out of the four members, three opposed him. Another measure, open to the same objection, was the choice of the chefs-lieux for the district courts. These he selected in the French counties without any regard to the wants and conveniences of the French population, but rather in opposition to them. In one case he chose a small and decayed village, in a most inaccessible part of the country, but in the neighbourhood of a population of 2,000 English, instead of the former chief town, five or six times the size of the other, in the most convenient position, and in the centre of a population of 20,000 French-Canadians. Can it be wondered then that this party opposed the union and all Lord Sydenham's measures with their utmost force—that they rejected his overtures and endeavoured to overthrow his government ? The mode in which several of the elections were carried in both provinces, but especially in Lower Canada, weakened his position with the honest and uncompromising reformers in the upper province and gave even Sir Allan MacNab a pretext for opposing him. With regard to the position of the government during the past session, nothing could be more precarious or difficult. It was only by dint of the greatest energy, and, I must add, the unscrupulous personal interference of Lord Sydenham, combined with practices that I would not use and your lordship would not recommend, in addition to the promise of the loan and the bribe of the public works, that Lord Sydenham managed to get through the session. Afterwards came the day of reckoning. The means and appliances being exhausted, the power that wielded them being broken (alas ! how rudely), up sprung a crowd of malcontents. Those who were before opposed to the government took courage ; those who were overawed by Lord Sydenham's boldness or firmness shook off their unwilling fealty ; all who had, or fancied they had, to complain of disappointed hopes or broken pledges joined in the defection. . . . Lord Sydenham was in fact the sole government—he decided everything and did it himself—sometimes consulting his council, but generally following his own opinion, and seldom bringing them together and consulting them collectively. To effect this required all the energy, activity, and habits of business which he individually possessed, together with his extraordinary boldness and unscrupulosity in dealing with individuals.’¹

¹ Sydenham's reasons were fully laid down in a dispatch to Russell, February 26, 1841, State Papers, G. 391, pp. 168 ff.

Sydenham's accomplishment must inevitably be judged in the light of the situation which Sir Charles Bagot found when he undertook office and in his estimate of those of Sydenham's actions which created that situation.

[AUTHORITIES.—The documents are in Egerton and Grant, Canadian Constitutional Development (Toronto, 1907) ; Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759–1915 (Oxford, 1918) ; G. P. Scrope, Memoir of the Life of the Right Hon. Charles, Lord Sydenham (London, 1844) ; Correspondence relative to the Affairs of Canada, 1840–1 ; Correspondence relative to the Re-union of Upper and Lower Canada, 1840 ; Journals of the Special Council of Lower Canada ; Journals of the House of Assembly, Upper Canada ; Journals of the House of Assembly, Canada ; State Papers, Series G, vols. cviii–cx (Canadian Archives). Adam Shortt, Lord Sydenham (Toronto, 1908), is the standard life, written with a thorough knowledge of the material. The most brilliant study of Sydenham's government is in J. L. Morison, British Supremacy and Canadian Self-government, 1839–54, pp. 70 ff. (Glasgow, 1919) (cf. the same author in Queen's Quarterly, July–September 1910).]

¹ Bagot to Stanley, September 26, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 163, p. 211 (Canadian Archives).

CHAPTER XIV

THE TESTING OF SYDENHAM'S SYSTEM

SIR CHARLES BAGOT and his successor Sir Charles (afterwards Lord) Metcalfe are usually studied in contrasts. There is much to encourage this point of view. Bagot was an old-world, cultured tory, a Georgian figure. When he came to take part in affairs, he drifted almost naturally into diplomacy, and he might have drifted into practical obscurity had not he been sent to Canada, where in one crowded year he achieved a permanent place in the history of the empire. He was the intimate friend of Thomas Grenville, who sent him congratulations on his appointment and the 'cordial regrets of an old man losing one of his most intimate friends';¹ of Lord Clarendon, who promised him fame in Canada and interested Lord John Russell on his behalf;² of Sir George Murray, who knew the Canadas and recommended to him 'the French-Canadians as the most anti-Yankee and also the most monarchical portion of the province';³ and of the Marquis Wellesley, who foretold his advantageous colonial policy.⁴ His dispatches form perhaps the most human set of documents in Canadian history. They are full of playfulness and wit, they are enlivened with joue d'esprit, and they display the charm of a letter-writer who belonged to a period and to a social circle when even diplomatic correspondence was a literary art. The perfect man of the world moves through them, allowing the glimmer of a charming personality to peep out here and there. They display a growing

¹ Grenville to Bagot, August 9, 1841, Bagot Correspondence, M. 158, p. 33 (Canadian Archives).

² Clarendon to Bagot, September 15, October 9, 1841, ibid., pp. 41, 170.

³ Murray to Bagot, October 7, 1841, ibid., p. 144.

⁴ Wellesley to Bagot, October 9, 1841, ibid., p. 174.

confidence, a gradually developing grasp of a situation, an increasing logical conviction, and a continuous sincerity of purpose which lend them almost the vitality and romantic interest of a novel, with a group of character studies worked up to a central and dramatic situation which gradually recedes before Bagot's lonely vigil with death. Were he to be estimated from these dispatches alone, he would appear as the self-restrained, even-tempered associate of Canning, with plenty of adaptability and possessing a reserve of determined courage, which he held in check until he had explored with tact every loophole of an easier way, and affairs demanded boldness rather than the risk of a compromise. With all his delicate touch, with all his cultured ease, Bagot was no weak figurehead. He had once been candid to a czar of Russia, and he had once taught the prince of Orange and the court of the Netherlands lessons in the manners of diplomacy.

Sir Charles Metcalfe was an Anglo-Indian who had spent his life in the east and had administered the government of Jamaica. He described himself as against the corn laws and religious intolerance, and in favour of vote by ballot, extension of the suffrage, improvement of the poor law, and equality of civil rights, but 'totally disqualified to be a demagogue'.¹ He was trained from his youth up in the devious ways of devious governments and he had had experience with a popular assembly. He had unbounded love for the empire, for British institutions, and for law. He was a man of the highest virtue and the greatest public spirit. He was one of the most successful governors of his day, who had devoted himself to the service of the crown in creating and working out administrative systems. He lacked, however, Bagot's elasticity of mind, and that calm confidence in necessary change which comes from varied contact with keen and studious minds. His dispatches stand in violent contrast with those of his predecessor. They are ponderous and stately, severely honest and wilfully wooden. For Metcalfe could not dream, if he would, of letting fancy or wit slip into an affair of state, or of allowing a human glow to touch the stern dignity of the queen's representative. There is no glad love for duty, no graceful yielding. They toe a line. They follow a course. They stand four-square. Metcalfe did not know the meaning of taking risks. The queen and empire made demands. They were his superiors, and it was not for him to temper the wind of commands to any shorn Canadian lamb. If he were as liberal as he professed to be, his liberalism was nullified by a rigidity of mind which had been cultivated and perfected in the unchanging east. He was a public servant who carried out the letter of his orders in unquestioning obedience. The régime of Bagot and of Metcalfe in Canada naturally reflected these different personalities.

¹ Metcalfe to R. D. Mangles, January 13, 1843, J. W. Kaye, Life and Correspondence of Charles, Lord Metcalfe, vol. ii, pp. 454 ff. (2 vols., London, 1854).

On the other hand, it is possible to drive the contrast too far, for both contributed by different ways to the solution of a political problem. Both were sent to govern Canada in the terms of Lord John Russell's dispatches. Their faces were directed to the future. They were to maintain the union, to hold themselves free from any party connexions, and to govern the country according to the well-understood wishes and interests of the people. Bagot began his administration in all seriousness and practically in detachment—his suspicions of Baldwin and the colonial office's warning against the French he held in reserve. The union he would maintain, party he would abjure; the third command presented difficulties. He saw only one conclusion, government by an executive which was trusted by the majority in the assembly. Metcalfe too would maintain the union and abjure party; the third command was not difficult, for the colonial office would inform him at any time who 'the people' were. He soon learned that they were not the majority, and he acted accordingly. In refusing, however, to accept the majority, and in following the colonial office's definition, he finally endangered the union which he had sworn to maintain, and became a party-leader, which he had declared was anathema to him.

Bagot and Metcalfe can, from this point of view, be studied together. Both started from the Russell-Sydenham pact of 1839. Bagot saw that in order to interpret his government in terms of the union and of the governor's disinterested impartiality, he must accept the logic of the Harrison-Sydenham resolutions of 1841 and follow it in order to save the new constitution and the administrator's new rôle. He could not find the wishes of the people either in space or in a vague general will. He could not seek them in the 'family compact' rump or in the colonial office. He could not turn back the clock. He could not divert the stream of development. He found the answer to the 'responsible government cry' in the affirmative of responsible government itself. Metcalfe started from the same points and found a similar answer by negative means. Trained in India, he was a man under authority. If the British government said that the clock must go back, that the stream must flow another way, Metcalfe bowed the head. To the colonial office all things were possible and even expedient, and he was prepared at all costs not merely to obey orders, but to obey any method of carrying them out. Bagot saw things in terms of an honest mind working with elastic adaptability and the power of balancing choices which the spirit of his instructions would bear. Metcalfe's mind was equally honest, but working in terms of an experience where the succession of time did not count, and where the diverting of streams was a regular occurrence. If the colonial office said, 'This is the way, walk in it', he did so. They had used 'union' and 'party' and 'people'; it was their duty to define and he would follow. In the issue, he proved Bagot's conclusions. By accepting the colonial office's definition of 'people' he nearly wrecked the union, and by heading the 'people' he became in spite of himself a party-leader. His experience met that of Bagot in the practical matter-of-fact mind with which Lord Elgin finally solved the question.

Bagot's instructions were issued by Lord Stanley on October 8, 1841.¹ Stanley was nothing if not brilliant, but his brilliancy was often of such a nature as to obscure any other light on a subject. He was a moderate conservative, who could not believe that there were real parties in Canada—nothing but parish politics and disloyal factions. If any one was to have power he preferred that it should be the old reactionary group headed by Sir Allan Napier MacNab. He did not want political power to pass into the hands of any one section in the province, and he impressed this wish on Bagot. But as difficulties gathered and he found that comprehension did not work, he pointed out to the governor a line of action: 'A stream you will have to pull against, do not doubt it; but having done your best to neutralize opposition by the nature of your measures, if the stream be still against you, bend your back to your oar like a man, and, above all, take none into your crew who will not bend their backs too, and who, instead of pulling with you, will either be cutting (sic) crabs or backing water when they are most wanted for "hard all". . . . MacNab is to dine with me on Thursday. . . . I think he is well disposed and reasonable. . . . but, although I am far from wishing to re-establish the old "family compact" of Upper Canada, if you come into difficulties that is the class of men to fall back upon, rather than the ultra-liberal party; at least, unless I am much mistaken they are both the soundest and carry with them the greatest individual and moral influence'.²

Stanley, however, was forced to recognize Sydenham's

¹ Bagot Correspondence, G. iii, p. 46.

² Stanley to Bagot, May 17, 1842, ibid., M. 165, p. 60.

work—indeed he recognized it to such an extent as to use at times his words and ideas—and his instructions were drawn up in the light of ‘a great experiment actually in progress’. The momentous nature of his work was pointed out to Bagot, and he was promised by express command of the queen every assistance from the imperial cabinet, and ‘the most favourable construction’ on any course which his judgement directed him to pursue. The general policy was outlined in the following terms: ‘You cannot too early and too distinctly give it to be understood that you enter the province with the determination to know no distinction of national origin or religious creed; to consult in your legislative capacity, and so far as may be consistent with your duty to your sovereign and your responsibility to her constitutional advisers, the wishes of the mass of the community; and, in your executive capacity, to administer the laws firmly, moderately, and impartially. You will invite to aid you in your labours for the welfare of the province all classes of the inhabitants; you will consider it your bounden duty to be accessible to the representations and prepared to listen to the complaints or the statements of the views of all; and the only passports to your favour will be loyalty to the queen, attachment to British connexion, and an efficient and faithful discharge of public duty.’ This policy was avowedly that of Lord Sydenham. So strongly was Stanley impressed with the necessity of following it out that he borrowed words used by Sydenham at Halifax in 1840:¹ ‘It must be your policy to withdraw the legislature and the population generally from the discussion of abstract and theoretical questions, by which the government of Canada in former times has been too often and too seriously embarrassed, to the calm and dispassionate consideration of practical measures.’ Bagot was to attempt to carry the assembly with him by continuing the benevolent paternalism of his predecessor, and ‘responsible government' was to be shelved as a dangerous theory by an appeal to material interests.

¹ Scrope, op. cit., p. 179.

Bagot was not long in the province before he found out that, excellent as his instructions were in spirit, there were serious difficulties before him. Sydenham had as it were trained a team which were going out to test themselves, and it was of the utmost importance if they could be taught to play to the whistle. The trainer had done his work, but he had not tested his men. Bagot realized, after a few weeks in consultation with his executive council, that Sydenham could never have hoped to control the assembly in a new session. Draper and Harrison informed him that they did not expect that the government would win on a vote of confidence. The Sydenham experiment was on the verge of failure. The moderate men were powerless against an 'unnatural alliance' between the 'family compact' and the French. The exclusion of the French-Canadians at once impressed Bagot as a political volcano. 'The narrowness of the foundations' on which the government was based constituted a grave error in tactics, and had resulted in the most unlikely political combinations to defeat or to obstruct the administration.¹ In actual life it had produced chaos. Acting under the direction of John Neilson, 'the bitterest opponent of the union', the local government of the lower province was at a standstill. The French-Canadians refused to put in motion the municipal machinery and assumed an attitude of 'passive resistance', intending to hurt the central authority through a break-down in local affairs.² Bagot anticipated that a discussion of the civil list would take place in the assembly; and he had little hope of carrying out the imperial instructions.³ He found that Sydenham had entered into a personal quarrel with the French-Canadians as a race, and that, in spite of hopes to the contrary, he inherited it.¹ They stood aloof in sulky antipathy.

¹ Bagot to Stanley, February 23, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 162, p. 153.

² Same to same, March 10, 1842, ibid., M. 162, p. 176.

³ Same to same, March 16, 26, 1842, ibid., M. 162, p. 23a; M. 160, p. 107.

Bagot tried hard to arrive at any course of action which was free from misinterpretation. 'I have discovered', he wrote, 'that the pomps and circumstances attendant upon the great station of top-sawyer in these woods scarcely compensates for the constant effort to keep oneself upright and steady on the log.'² He decided against an immediate summoning of the legislature. His executive warned him that he had not 'sufficient materials to occupy their time and attention through the sessions', and that thus the assembly would be left 'to create business for themselves by the discussion of abstract and inconvenient questions, such as non-confidence in ministers', which they might 'possibly carry at this particular moment'. He considered that the legislative council needed widening, and that the judicial system of Lower Canada must be placed on a more secure footing.³ After long correspondence with the colonial office, in which Stanley canvassed the names suggested from every angle of loyalty and safeness, Bagot succeeded in appointing several French-Canadians to the higher judicial places. In his efforts to make his councils more comprehensive, he included Francis Hincks, a reformer and a financier of first-class ability. He failed to secure a strong member of the 'family compact' in J. S. Cartwright. Cartwright saw the necessity even of giving weight to the French-Canadians, but he refused to sit on any executive which included such a pronounced liberal as Hincks.⁴ Bagot, however, continued to hope that he could treat his advent as a new starting-place, 'a new chapter in the history', by 'doing away with all the old party divisions'. In spite of Stanley's warning that his blendings of

¹ Bagot to Stanley, June 12, 1842, ibid., M. 160, p. 255.

² Same to same, March 27, 1842, ibid., M. 165, p. 36 a.

³ Same to same, January 24 (?), 1842, ibid., M. 160, p. 16.

⁴ Cartwright to Bagot, May 16, 1842, ibid., M. 158, p. 310; cf. N. F. Davin, The Irishman in Canada, pp. 478 ff. (Toronto, 1877).

'white' toryism and 'black' radicalism might not produce 'a good grey', he considered that the effort might be justified, even if it succeeded merely in taking away grounds of complaint.¹ It was soon evident that these methods had failed to win over the French-Canadians or to break the solidity of their opposition. Every French-Canadian who accepted an appointment of any nature became immediately 'le vendu', and 'le vendu' he remained. He immediately lost his influence over his compatriots. An individual was gained, not a race.² The problem had passed beyond Sydenham's formula, and Bagot began to seek the intimate advice of Draper, a moderate conservative, and Harrison, a moderate reformer. With the advice which he received from them the plot thickened to its dramatic dénouement, and the dispatches from July to September 1842 became pregnant with momentous movements.

A dispassionate view of the situation disclosed to Bagot the fact that the government would go down to almost certain defeat without the French-Canadian vote, which undoubtedly possessed the political power. The executive was opposed to the representatives of the people and could command no confidence. The Sydenham-Harrison resolutions left no course open to them but to resign. The governor-general could then adopt one of two courses. He could dissolve the assembly and appeal to the people, with the certainty of having the vote of no confidence carried by the electorate. He could send for Baldwin and La Fontaine. Harrison advised the latter course immediately. It was the only wise solution.³ Draper was equally certain that the government must be reconstructed and that 'public business could only be carried on through the French party'. A single appointment would avail nothing, the trial must be made of appealing to the leaders: 'One thing

¹ Bagot to Stanley, June 12, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 160 p. 225.

² Same to same, July 10, 1842, ibid., M. 160, p. 325.

³ Harrison to Bagot, July 11, 1842, ibid., M. 158, p. 412.

I do not doubt at all, and that is that with the present house of assembly you cannot get on without the French, while it is necessary for me at the same time to declare frankly that I cannot sit at the council board with Mr. Baldwin. My resignation will be immediate on my becoming aware of his appointment.’¹ Bagot hesitated. For nearly a fortnight he worked at the situation. He knew defeat for the government was practically inevitable. He had ‘no fear of admitting the French as a party into a share of the government’ as far as regards any hostility to the union. He believed their admission ‘to a share in the government, to which, after all, they were, theoretically at least, justly entitled’, would result in lifting their theories and discontents out of discussion. Baldwin was the crux. Bagot was prepared to take ‘any hazards rather than see him again introduced into the council’. He had betrayed Sydenham and his inclusion would dissolve the ministry as then constituted. To make the plunge would call forth united opposition in England, would give the lie to Durham’s advice on the French-Canadian problem, and would provide an immediate censure of Sydenham’s régime. No illusions, however, remained: ‘the moment has come when this question must be determined one way or the other, and this government be carried on either in professed exclusion and defiance of the Canadians of French origin, or by their admission to such a share in it as they may be contented to receive, and the mother country may deem it safe and reasonable to give them. . . . It is impossible to disguise from oneself that the French members of the assembly possess the power of the country, and whoever directs that power by the most efficient means of controlling it is in a situation to govern the province most effectually.’ Bagot had not, he confessed, the political courage to decide, and he asked for a 'simple "yea" or "nay"' from the imperial cabinet.¹ A small majority might possibly be secured, and he proposed to follow Sydenham's methods and open the session with a speech suggesting popular measures, perhaps an amnesty.²

¹ Draper to Bagot, July 16, 1842, ibid., M. 158, p. 442; Draper to Egerton Ryerson, September 16, 1842, Hodgins Papers, [A], I. D. 11. 2 (Ontario Archives).

In England, Stanley was under no wise guidance in Canadian affairs. MacNab was telling him 'that the loyal party in Canada . . . felt that an unprincipled departure from the conservative policy had placed the country in the most imminent peril'. They had been 'insulted, degraded, many of them ruined' from the encouragement given by the administration to men 'whose whole career had been unmitigated hostility to the crown, government, and institutions'. The associates of rebels 'sat at the governor's table', and 'the "compact party", which took arms to suppress the rebellion', had been disappointed in their loyal hopes.³ The news from Canada did not thus fall on very well-prepared ground, and Bagot's dispatches drove the colonial office into frenzied panic. Stanley sent them at once to Sir Robert Peel, and informed him that if Bagot could not command a majority 'the union was a failure and the Canadas were gone'. He hoped the governor would multiply 'vendus' and disintegrate the French party, rather than dream of attempting to govern with traitors.⁴ Peel pleaded lack of intimate knowledge, but on general principles he advised to accept defeat and not to dissolve the legislature. Bagot could nurse the good sense and justice of the province, if the French party in case of extremes were called to power but wished to dictate terms. He appealed to the skill of George III and of Louis-Philippe in managing legislatures, and pointed out how 'firmness, moderation, and dignified long-suffering' would help the perplexed and sorely tried governor

¹ Bagot to Stanley, July 28, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 161, p. 22.

² Same to same, August 25, 1842, ibid., M. 163, p. 36.

³ MacNab to Stanley, August 2, 1842, ibid., M. 165, p. 125.

⁴ Stanley to Peel, August 27, 1842, ibid., M. 165, p. 143.

in 'combating a majority in a popular assembly'.¹ Peel's lack of knowledge was self-evident. Stanley went over the lists of the assembly with Murdoch, whom Bagot had inherited from Sydenham as civil secretary, and he thought he could just see a majority. Eight or ten seemed to be 'waiters on Providence or rather on patronage'. The deduction ought to be self-evident. To call in the French could only be a last, final resort, and ought not to be done 'until it is manifest to this country, and manifest to the conservatives and supporters of British influence in Canada generally, that you cannot carry on the government without the French party, and that you can carry it on through and by them. Do not mistake me. When I say the French party, I mean that party conducted by its present leaders and headed by men more or less implicated in the late rebellion. You may ultimately be forced to take these men; but do not take them till the world shall see that you are so forced, and my hope and belief is that the necessity will never arise.' Multiply 'vendus'. It may not conciliate the party, it may ruin the men, but 'the example will be found catching'. The amnesty would be 'a difficult card to play'.²

Stanley's dispatch was not received till September 21. Meanwhile Bagot summoned the legislature on the 8th, and delivered a practical speech in which he alluded to the better relations with the United States under the recently concluded Ashburton treaty and to the possibility of a reform of the Canadian tariffs.³ He had decided to meet the legislature with his composite council. The challenge to his courage was not long in coming. On the first day John Neilson, 'that lover of all mischief for its own sake',⁴ moved for copies of any imperial dispatches relating to 'an indemnity and general pardon'.

¹ Peel to Stanley, August 28, 1842, ibid., M. 165, p. 146; cf. C. S. Parker, Sir Robert Peel from his private Papers, vol. i, pp. 379 ff. (London, 1899).

² Stanley to Bagot, September 1, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 165, p. 151.

³ Bagot to Stanley, September 10, 1842, ibid., M. 163, p. 52.

⁴ Same to same, March 26, 1842, ibid., M. 160, p. 105.

Early in the afternoon of the 13th, Bagot wrote to Stanley hoping that he could shelve the question by an expression of goodwill.¹ Before nightfall, the circumstances necessary for justification before the world had arisen, a working majority could not be secured. The day closed in dramatic episodes. Bagot communicated with La Fontaine and made him large offers, which he hesitated to accept. The governor hesitated to advance. In the tense crisis, the executive council sent a unanimous communication stating that unless negotiations with the French-Canadians were successful the government could not be carried on, and that in accordance with the Sydenham-Harrison resolutions they must resign.² Bagot at once sat down and wrote, with the advice of his executive, to La Fontaine offering him four seats in the cabinet and the clerkship of the council. La Fontaine was asked to become attorney-general for Lower Canada with a seat in the executive council. His suggestions were invited in filling the office of solicitor-general for the same province. A French-Canadian was to become commissioner for crown lands with a seat in the council, and the post of confidential clerk was to be offered to a French-Canadian. Baldwin's name inevitably entered into the communications, and Bagot expressed his willingness to avail himself of his services. The surrender meant Draper's resignation and the necessity of getting rid of Charles Richard Ogden, the attorney-general, and John Davidson, the crown-lands' commissioner. Bagot felt compelled to lay down a condition that the two last should be provided with pensions.³ Meanwhile the 'high conservative party', headed by the 'intriguing, slippery, unprincipled man', MacNab, 'had made overtures to the French-Canadians and the extreme opponents of the government and were prepared to combine with them in order to overthrow the executive council, heedless of the inconsistency of such a course'. La Fontaine still held out, and a vote of 'direct expression of want of confidence was moved'. Bagot decided on a bold move. He authorized Draper to read to the house his written proposals to La Fontaine: 'The effect was instantaneous. The negotiation was renewed the next morning, the point at issue was compromised, and the arrangement completed.'¹ The pensions were to be left an open question, and in addition to previous offers Baldwin was to come in as one of the law officers for Upper Canada, sacrificing the present holder of the office. Accordingly, Ogden, Davidson, and Sherwood were firmly but courteously removed. Bagot's letters to them practically amounted to peremptory commands, and the thin veneer of praise and regret could not hide the hard bargain which had been driven.²

¹ Bagot to Stanley, September 13, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 161, p. 88.

² Same to same, September 13, 1842 (at night), ibid., M. 161, p. 97.

³ Bagot to La Fontaine, September 13, 1842, ibid., M. 161, p. 109.

A motion confirming the new executive in the confidence of the assembly was carried with only five dissentients. Bagot summed up the result in one of his most brilliant and analytical dispatches: 'I have united the voice of seven-eighths of the house of assembly in present support of the government. . . . I have met the wishes of a large majority of the population of Upper Canada and of the British inhabitants of Lower Canada. I have removed the main ground of discontent and distrust among the French-Canadian population. I have satisfied them that the union is capable of being administered for their happiness and advantage and have consequently disarmed their opposition to it. I have excited among them the strongest feeling of gratitude to the provincial government, and if my policy be approved by H.M.'s government, I shall have removed their chief cause of hostility to British institutions, and have added another security for their devotion to the British crown

¹ Bagot to La Fontaine, September 16, 1842, ibid., M. 158, p. 595; La Fontaine to Bagot, September 16, 1842, ibid., M. 158, p. 593.

² Bagot to Sherwood, September 16, 17, 1842; same to Ogden, September 19, 1842, ibid., M. 161, pp. 103 116, 125.

. . . The present crisis has offered the occasion ; I have seized it.' In calm and dignified reserve he was prepared to receive blame at home from the partisans of 'the exclusive system', perhaps from the cabinet. To the latter he trusted himself. He realized the gravity of his action. The welfare of the province was the issue, and he could only ask for 'prompt sanction and firm support', which were essential to the successful working of his policy.¹ If approval were possible, he asked for it in full measure, as it would 'cast the veil of oblivion over past disaffection, and remove the brand of rebels from those to whom the Act of Union has given all the powers of representative government'.² 'I found the union was not completed. Sydenham had effected the fiançailles—the marriage, as he very well knew, must be the work of his successor. Every circumstance appeared to me to combine in suggesting that the moment was favourable for performing that ceremony. Accident forced upon me the necessity of immediate decision, and upon my own responsibility I have decided. If I have judged wrong . . . let me urge upon you the expediency of immediately disavowing it by my public recall. . . . I can say no more. I must, and I am prepared to, stand or fall by the statement of all that has occurred . . . if to fall, to fall without remonstrance or complaint, and with unfeigned deference to those who in such matters must have more knowledge than I can be supposed to have.'³ The government was reconstructed on September 26th, with La Fontaine as attorney-general and Thomas Cushing Aylwin as solicitor-general for Canada East, and Baldwin as attorney-general and John E. Small as solicitor-general for Canada West. Within a few days it was in working order and La Fontaine was writing in French to the governor pointing out that John J. Girouard

¹ Bagot to Stanley, September 26, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 163, p. 57.

² Same to same, September 26, 1842 (confidential dispatch), ibid., M. 163, p. 211.

³ Same to same, September 26, 1842 (private letter), ibid., M. 161, p. 131.

could not accept office as crown-lands' commissioner, and suggesting to him the name of his personal and political friend, Auguste Norbert Morin. Bagot replied in French accepting the suggestion.¹

In Canada a storm broke over Bagot's head. He had 'handed the British over to the vindictive disposition of the French mob'. He was 'a governor without any opinion of his own, ready to veer about at every breath of opposition'. 'A radical ministry cannot last long. Loyal men must begin to combine and act: they need not despair: they have God on their side and a fair cause, over which no treachery can finally triumph. . . . It is impossible to approach these subjects without feelings which defy expression.'² The papers which had not such an insight into the workings of the divine mind were less dignified. 'According to the "family compact" journals', wrote Bagot, 'I am a "radical", a "puppet", an "old woman", an "apostate", and a renegade descendant of old Colonel Bagot who fell at Naseby fighting for his king.'³ From Lower Canada came the vital insight: 'The great principle of responsibility is formally and solemnly recognized by the representative of the crown, and sealed with the approbation of the assembly. From this period dates a revolution effected without blood or slaughter; but none the less glorious.' It was the beginning of a genuine preservation of the 'connexion between this country and the mother country . . . not a union of parchment, but a union of hearts and of free born men'.⁴

In England, Stanley continued to hope for the best and promised the imperial support in case of defeat.⁵ When the ¹ La Fontaine to Bagot, September 27; Bagot to La Fontaine, October 1, 1842, ibid., M. 158, pp. 618, 633.

² Church Extra, September 17, 1842, Robinson MSS. [A], E. 24, 23 (22) (Ontario Archives).

³ Bagot to Stanley, October 28, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 161, p. 164.

⁴ Baldwin's defence of his position in the House of Assembly, Kingston Chronicle and Gazette, September 17, 1842.

⁵ Stanley to Bagot, October 8, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 165, p. 177.

blow fell he was startled and surprised. He had hoped that the French would never be recognized as a party, and he deplored the circumstances so opposed to the wishes of the cabinet.¹ The advice of the executive in Canada to bring in La Fontaine was 'injudicious, and in giving it they went beyond the proper limits of their functions'. They could resign, but to suggest their successors was unconstitutional. Bagot's procedure was open to grave objections, and to enter into correspondence on terms was impolitic. But Stanley had to face facts. He saw a government working smoothly with the governor and house of assembly and he was forced to write : 'Her majesty's government are prepared to acquiesce in the line of policy which you have taken and to advise the queen to sanction and confirm it. It will be my duty, acting on her majesty's behalf, to give to your administration a cordial support and to the measures which it may bring forward the most favourable consideration. . . . I have to express the hope that its formation may have the effect of extinguishing party and national animosities, and of directing the minds of all men in Canada, of whatever origin, to the advancement of the prosperity of their native or adopted country. I cannot but entertain the sanguine hope and belief that, as her majesty cheerfully assents in the composition of your executive council to that which appears to be the general wish of the colony, in compliance with those constitutional principles on which the Act of Union was framed, her subjects of all denominations will look upon that Act as at once the protection and the limit of their rights, and recognize in a strict adherence to its conditions the best security for a due adjustment of the prerogative of the sovereign and the liberties of the people.'² This quotation will help to dispel some of the illusions. Whatever the future, the imperial government in its official dispatches gave to Bagot's experiment full approval after a special meeting of the cabinet. What Stanley most feared was not a situation in Canada, but a situation in England hurtful to his party. Bagot could only be defended, and the government in England with him, on the lines that suspected rebels had compelled their own selection. On the necessity of the case alone would the governor receive public defence. He was promised that it would be cordial and in earnest, but the general policy was outlined in unmistakable terms. Impressions in Canada might matter, but 'impressions at home' and the 'possible effect on other countries' were serious and vital considerations. To recall Bagot would only make a checkmate certain for his successor in trying, as ex hypothesi he must, to retrace the steps which had been taken. 'We do not disapprove your policy, we are prepared to support it, and defend you for having pursued it. Only we must rest your defence on the impossibility of your carrying on the government without having recourse to the men whom you have called to your councils. . . . The present seems to me a favourable time for impressing on your government, as a body, the propriety and the necessity of adopting the Act of Union as a whole, and of declaring their intention to stand by its provisions, including the civil list and every other debatable question—to take it in short as a fait accompli, which in the main has secured to them good government and the power of self-government.'¹ Self-government they assumed it to be, and Bagot confessed that it was virtually responsible government.²

¹ Stanley to Bagot, October 16, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, M. 165, p. 180.

² Same to same, November 2, 1842, ibid., G. 115, p. 127.

The concluding months were full of pain and hope. Bagot suffered from a long illness, heroically endured, but at last he was forced to resign. Sir Charles Metcalfe was selected to succeed as the man 'quite prepared to follow out the lines which Bagot had traced and to give full effect to his policy'.³

¹ Stanley to Bagot, November 3, 1842, ibid., M. 165, p. 186.

² Bagot to Stanley, October 28, 1842, ibid., M. 161, p. 164.

³ Stanley to Bagot, February 3, 1843, ibid., M. 165, p. 216.

When Bagot heard the news he was delighted. 'So far as I am concerned', he wrote, 'nothing could be so satisfactory to me as the appointment of Sir Theos. Metcalfe; often have I lain upon my bed considering whom I should most desire to have as my successor and to play out my hand here, and Metcalfe has invariably presented himself to me.'¹ Almost Bagot's last words were, 'I have found no reason to regret my course . . . the general tranquillity of the country throughout is beyond what I could have ventured to anticipate. My belief is that this state of things will continue, and more especially under the idea and management of such a man as Sir C. Metcalfe, who is, from all that I know and can learn of him, the unicus homo for the post.'² It was well for Bagot that he did not live to see the fateful destiny which lay before his successor. At any rate, had he lived he would have had the satisfaction of knowing that Metcalfe's policy was his own best justification.

The closing scene fitfully concludes the life of one of the greatest colonial statesmen. 'The sympathy expressed towards him in all the province is very strong: among the Lower Canadians it has exhibited itself in a mode that never before greeted a governor of this province—in masses and public prayers.'³ His last letter was a message to his executive council: 'My reputation is in your hands. I know that you will all protect it—I am too exhausted to say more.'⁴ La Fontaine and Baldwin proved worthy executors. In the destiny of the young nation, at whose birth-pangs Bagot stood, they guarded his reputation not merely in private but in the

¹ Bagot to Stanley, February 23, 1843, Bagot Correspondence, M. 171, p. 295.

² Same to same, March 26, 1843, ibid., M. 161, p. 318.

³ Rawson (Bagot's civil secretary) to Arthur Blackwood (of the colonial office), December 27, 1842, C.O. 42, vol. 495. For a less pleasing side of the picture see, inter alia, Richardson, Eight Years in Canada, embracing a Review of the Administration of . . . Sir Charles Bagot . . . (Montreal, 1847).

⁴ Bagot to Aylwin, March 29, 1843, Bagot Correspondence, M. 161, p. 325.

fierce light of publicity, and gave to responsible government its final security within the empire.

[AUTHORITIES.—The chief authority for Bagot's government is contained in the Bagot Papers and Correspondence (Canadian Archives), which has been used throughout. The contemporary newspapers are invaluable, especially the Montreal Gazette, the Montreal Transcript, the New York Albion, the Toronto Herald, the Kingston Chronicle and Gazette. Baldwin's Correspondence (the Reference Library, Toronto) begins to be of importance. F. Hincks, The Political History of Canada between 1840 and 1855 (Montreal, 1877), and Reminiscences of his Public Life (Montreal, 1884) are of first-rate importance. J. L. Morison, British Supremacy and Canadian Self-government, 1839-54 (Glasgow, 1919), contains an excellent study of Bagot's régime. Consult also the same author's Sir Charles Bagot : An Incident in Canadian Parliamentary History (Bulletins, History and Economics, No. 4. Kingston 1912).]

CHAPTER XV

SELF-GOVERNING OR CROWN COLONY

It is impossible to read Sir Charles Metcalfe's life or to study his dispatches without regretting that he came to Canada. It is true that in making the last attempt by a representative of the crown actually to govern, he proved the impossibility of doing so, but he hurt a magnificent reputation in the service of the empire. He stands among the foremost men in history in disinterested duty and in noble conceptions of responsibility. The 'Metcalfe crisis' owed its origin to these virtues. He believed that the royal prerogative was in danger, and rather than betray a definite trust committed to him by his sovereign, he almost precipitated another rebellion which might have lost the Canadas to the empire to which the devotion of a lifetime had been given. He had no desire to govern contrary to public opinion, or to act the petty tyrant or the arbitrary autocrat. He was willing to go as far as possible with Bagot's experiment. He regretted it and expressed his regret in clear-cut terms. If driven to its full logic, he could see only separation and independence ahead. He created a dilemma for himself—how to work responsible government in such a way as to secure governing powers of a real nature to the governor. There came a point in actual affairs when a choice was forced upon him, and he made it deliberately and honestly because he believed that he could not surrender what he considered the patronage of the crown. He refused to accept the full implications of responsible government. He would not grant that there was a 'cabinet' or a 'ministry' in Canada, and he endured untold physical and mental suffering in sheer devotion to his duty as he saw it, in order to hand over to his successor a colony to which he had taught a lesson on behalf of the crown's rights. The issue was for him a moral one, and never for a moment did he deviate from the path of his duty. It is well that a consideration of his government in Canada should be prefaced with a tribute to his character. In the most trying moments, when the noise of battle was deafening, when uncontrolled forces of invective were let loose in a rugged, ill-trained, uncultured, and uncouth province, he never once forgot that the position which he filled demanded gentlemanly dignity. In the fierceness of the most bitter election in Canadian history, and one in which he felt called on to take part, he did not descend for a moment to the levels of vulgar abuse. There is not a malignant word in his dispatches, not a sharp innuendo in all his recorded writings. His political experience never hardened his kindly generous heart. It was an excellent object lesson, both for tactless friends and for unbridled foes, to come into contact with a man who never allowed his official life to warp the private social amenities. In the darkest days, when even his terrible disease aroused hopes for his quick removal either by death or by resignation, he bore himself with calm courtesy and continued his wide and generous charity. His kindness was boundless and his goodwill knew neither friend nor foe. In the cold analysis of history, the man is liable to be obscured. For Metcalfe reasserted the claim that the governor had the power to govern, and could exercise it if he wished; that executive government depended not on public sanction, but on his private favour. The claim was such a challenge to constitutional evolution that it has overshadowed all that was best in Metcalfe, leaving little place for that necessary consideration of circumstances which alone gives to historical judgements any validity.

His rigidity of mind has already been pointed out, as well as his unsuitability in a government such as the Canadas. But he had another defect for his new position which at once appeared. His conception of the empire made him incapable of seeing things in their true character, and his devotion to the imperial idea was so much like that of an uncritical lover that it obscured his judgement and numbed his sense of political values. He was the greatest United Empire loyalist in Canadian history. His loyalty, however, drove him to think of unity in terms of uniformity and obscured differences and developments in the constitutional parts. He had scarcely been a week in the province before he was deploring the fact that he had not the same material to work on that he had in Jamaica,¹ and when he contemplated the executive council and the house of assembly bequeathed to him by Bagot, he compared his task to that of a governor in India with a Mohammedan council and a Mohammedan popular chamber. He had no intention of submitting in a challenge: 'I cannot . . . surrender the queen's government into the hands of rebels and . . . become myself their ignominious tool. I know not what the end will be. The only thing certain is that I cannot yield.'²

Within a month, he had apparently weighed the Canadian situation in a balance with which he was most familiar, but which unfortunately was perhaps the most dangerous possible for the Canadas—that of loyalty to the mother country. To Metcalfe this meant the loyalty of childhood, and to the tory group it meant social status, privilege, places, and patronage. He deplored that the 'republicans' were in power and that he was 'condemned . . . to carry on the government to the utter exclusion of those on whom the mother country might confidently rely in the hour of need'. He saw no remedy 'without setting at defiance the operation of responsible administration which has been introduced into this colony'.³

¹ Metcalfe to his sister, April 9, 1843, J. W. Kaye, Life and Correspondence of Charles, Lord Metcalfe, vol. ii, p. 471 (2 vols., London, 1854).

² Metcalfe to Colonel Stokes, ibid., p. 528.

³ Metcalfe to Stanley, April 25, 1843, J. W. Kaye, Selections from the Papers of Lord Metcalfe, pp. 407 ff. (London, 1855).

If Metcalfe had not fallen already into the hands of the 'family compact', it is only possible to conclude that Stanley had biased his outlook, which is strangely like that of the colonial secretary's dispatches to Bagot. In trying to analyse public opinion, he was forced to believe that in the coercion of his predecessor party government had been set up. Bagot completed Sydenham's work: 'the events were regarded by all parties in the country as establishing in full force the system of responsible government, of which the practical execution had been before incomplete.' As a result 'the tone of the public voice regarding responsible government has been greatly exalted. The council are now spoken of by themselves and others generally as "the ministers", "the administration", "the cabinet", "the government", and so forth. Their pretensions are according to this new nomenclature. They regard themselves as a responsible ministry and expect that the policy and conduct of the governor shall be subservient to their views and party purposes.'¹ Durham might theorize at leisure; Sydenham might risk an idea which for the greater part of his administration had no existence and was only coming into operation when he died; Bagot might be forced into a position which he did not live to dispute: 'now comes the tug-of-war'.² The governor saw that a struggle was inevitable and he formulated at once his policy: 'the general purpose which I purpose to pursue towards the council is to treat them with the confidence and cordiality due to the station which they occupy; to consult them not only whenever the law or established usage requires that process, but also whenever the importance of the occasion recommends it, and whenever I conceive that the public service will be benefited by their aid and advice.' He was prepared to treat his executive with more than constitutional confidence, but at the same time he was prepared to be on his guard 'against their encroachments'. He anticipated 'a difference with them in their claim that the government shall be administered in subservience to their party views. They expect that the patronage shall be bestowed exclusively on members of their party.'¹ The storm soon began to gather, and the one vital question which kept ringing in Metcalfe's head was what was to become of the governor-general.² It is well to give in his own words his summary of conditions before the storm of encroachments finally broke.

¹ Metcalfe to Stanley, April 24, 1843, Kaye, Life, vol. ii, p. 477.

² Same to same, May 12, 1843, ibid., p. 479.

'I learn', he informed Stanley, 'that my attempts to conciliate all parties are criminal in the eyes of the council. . . . I am required to give myself up entirely to the council, to submit absolutely to their dictation, to have no judgement of my own, to bestow the patronage of the government exclusively on their partisans, to proscribe their opponents, and to make some public and unequivocal declaration of my adhesion to those conditions—including the complete nullification of her majesty's government. . . . Failing of submission to these stipulations I am threatened with the resignation of Mr. La Fontaine for one, and both he and I are fully aware of the serious consequences likely to follow the execution of that menace, from the blindness with which the French-Canadian party follow their leader. . . . I need hardly say, that although I see the necessity for caution, I have no intention of tearing up her majesty's commission by submitting to the prescribed conditions. . . . The sole question is, to describe it without disguise, whether the governor shall be solely and completely a tool in the hands of the council, or whether he shall have any exercise of his own judgement in the administration of the government. Such a question has not come forward as a matter of discussion, but there is no doubt that the leader of the French party speaks the sentiments of others of his council besides himself. . . . As I cannot possibly adopt them, I must be prepared for the consequence of a rupture with the council, or at least the most influential portion of it. . . . I must expect it, for I cannot consent to be the tool of a party and to proscribe all those who defended their party in the hour of need against foreign invasion and internal rebellion. I am an advocate for entire forgetfulness of past offences against the state ; but it is provoking to find that those who claim amnesty for rebels and brigands, with whom to a certain extent they sympathized, are inveterate in their hostility to those who were faithful to their sovereign and country. . . . Government by a majority is the explanation of responsible government given by the leader in this movement, and government without a majority must be admitted to be ultimately impracticable. But the present question—and the one which is coming on for trial in my administration—is not whether the governor shall so conduct his government as to meet the wants and wishes of the people and obtain their suffrages by promoting their welfare and happiness, nor whether he shall be responsible for his measures to the people through their representatives, but whether he shall or shall not have a voice in his own council ; whether he shall be at liberty to treat all her majesty's subjects with equal justice, or be a reluctant and passive tool in the hands of a party for the purpose of proscribing their opponents, those opponents being the portion of the community most attached to British connexion, and the governor required to proscribe them being a British governor. The tendency of this movement is to throw off the government of the mother country in internal affairs entirely, but to be maintained and supported at her expense, and to have all the advantages of connexion as long as it may suit the majority of the people of Canada to endure it. This is a very intelligible and very convenient policy for a Canadian aiming at independence, but the part the representative of the mother country is required to perform in it is by no means fascinating.’¹

¹ Metcalfe to Stanley, April 24, 1843, Kaye. Life, vol. ii, p. 492.

² Ibid., p. 476.

It might be possible to dismiss this dispatch by saying that Metcalfe wrote it, but that MacNab conceived it, and unfortunately it has been so dismissed. On the other hand, there is a background of circumstances which will not permit such a cursory judgement. On his arrival in the province, Metcalfe was deluged with addresses which disclosed the existence of severe extremes. He was invited to resist the anti-British faction and to show himself a constitutional governor by dismissing his council; or, he was solemnly but conscientiously enjoined to hold fast to La Fontaine and Baldwin lest worse things should come upon him. He believed before long that ‘the violence of party spirit’ was so great that civil war was not improbable. His duty lay in quelling the spirit. He saw the council preparing an issue on the question of patronage. He believed honestly, and perhaps with truth, that they intended to use it for party ends. As all appointments were made in his name, he refused to become the unwilling patron of party, especially as it meant that ‘the loyal portion of the people’ would not receive a share from ‘a rebel government’. In addition, the handing over of all patronage to the executive council would rob him of what he considered the best available means at his disposal for crushing the threatening factions. ‘I wish’, he wrote ‘to make the patronage of the government conducive to the conciliation of all parties, by bringing into the public service the men of greatest merit and efficiency without any party distinction. My powers of usefulness . . . will be paralysed by my being forced in any degree to act as the supporter of a party.’² He aimed to govern through an executive government whose support would rest on the votes of those whom his measures had made happy and contented ; and he intended to distribute the patronage of the province in such a way that the recalcitrant citizens would keep quiet hoping for their turn. Pending the time when he had an executive and an assembly elected on the platform of 'the governor and happiness', Metcalfe did not see that he was making himself a party-leader against the majority of the province. Patronage was a royal prerogative. It could best be used in conjunction with popular wishes, but it must never be surrendered exclusively to party control, even though that control reflected the overwhelming wishes of the people.

¹ Metcalfe to Stanley, May 12, 1843 Kaye, Life, vol. ii, pp. 493 ff.

² Same to same, April 24, 1843, ibid., p. 493.

Metcalfe determined to get the issues clear, and an interview between his civil secretary, Captain Higginson, and La Fontaine towards the close of May 1843 was undoubtedly a ballon d'essai. The immediate question was that of an appointment to the vacant office of provincial aide-de-camp, and was in itself of little importance or bearing. The significance lies in the fact that La Fontaine drew up an account of the interview, which is of the utmost importance in the light of future events. Higginson politely protested that he was acting in a private capacity—and he was doubtless formally correct—when he requested an opportunity to discuss the name of a certain officer and the general constitutional situation. He asked La Fontaine to explain what he meant by responsible government and its implications. La Fontaine informed him that it included the responsibility of the executive to the legislature for all acts of government, and that when the legislature withdrew its confidence the executive would resign. That he and his colleagues had taken office relying on the Sydenham-Harrison resolutions. The discussion then turned to the question of consultation or non-consultation among the cabinet in the exercise of patronage. La Fontaine pointed out that appointments to all offices were part of the responsibility owed by the entire executive to the legislature, and consultation was thus necessary ; but the governor could accept or reject the nominations of his council, ' his excellency not being bound, and it not being possible to bind him, to follow that advice, but, on the contrary, having a right to reject it ; but in this latter case, if the members of the council did not choose to assume the responsibility of the act that the governor wished to perform contrary to their advice, they had the means of relieving themselves from it by exercising their power of resigning.' Higginson challenged this interpretation of the Sydenham-Harrison pact. He refused to accept the principle of united executive responsibility. He believed that each member of the administration ought to be responsible for the acts of his department alone, and that he ought as a consequence to have the liberty of voting with or against his colleagues whenever he judged fit ; that thus an administration composed of the principal members of each party might exist advantageously for all parties, and would furnish the governor the means of better understanding the views and opinions of each party, and would not fail, under the auspices of the governor, to lead to the reconciliation of all. La Fontaine replied that if that was Metcalfe's idea of responsible government, the sooner he let the council understand it the better, in order to avoid future complications. He repudiated the interpretation of the resolutions.¹ Metcalfe was thus well on the way to a serious crisis. His executive had one conception of government and he another, both derived from a formula to which the crown had assented. It was little wonder that, with disagreement in his councils and with ' the wars of the ins and the outs ' raging outside, he felt the burden of toiling on in the ' slough of despond ', and found ' the whole concern rotten at the core '.²

¹ La Fontaine's account of the interview is in Hincks's Reminiscences of his Public Life, pp. 93 ff. (Montreal, 1884).

² Metcalfe to a friend, July 15 ; to his sister, August 27, 1843, Kaye, Life vol. ii, pp. 500, 505.

‘Hope I have none, not even of escape.’ With these words in his mouth, he heroically attacked the entire problem ab initio, and in two long dispatches he summed up the Canadian system of government and his own position.¹ He had no difficulty in concluding that Sydenham would never have accepted La Fontaine’s claims. His position was that a vote of want of confidence in the assembly would be unconstitutional, but the assembly could constitutionally petition for the governor’s recall. The Sydenham rule was, ‘The governor is the responsible government, his subordinate officers are responsible to him not to the legislative assembly, he is responsible to the ministers of the crown and liable to appeals from the colony against his proceedings ; it being at the same time incumbent on him to consult local feelings and not to persist in employing individuals justly obnoxious to the community’. Sydenham, however, made the provincial theory of responsible government inevitable, and he could never have hoped to withstand it had he lived. Metcalfe doubted if Durham meant to advise cabinet government in the colonies, and thus to render the governor a cipher, but Sydenham had created such beginnings that Bagot could be coerced into accepting a council no longer chosen by himself but by the assembly for him. There was thus a cabinet, and thus there were parties, which he hated. The issues were, however, deeper : ‘it becomes a question whether party government can be avoided. The experiment of responsible government in this colony hitherto would indicate that it cannot. It seems to me inevitable in free and independent states where responsible government exists ; . . . but there is a wide difference between an independent state and a colony. In an independent state all parties must generally desire the welfare of the state. In a colony subordinate to an imperial government, it may happen that the predominant party is hostile in its feelings to the mother country, or has ulterior views inconsistent with her interests.' He found his 'extreme and possible case' so far applicable to Canada that the well affected and loyal had no political power. The prospects for change from 'democratic and party government' were few, but unless they came the governor must remain a mere 'tool in the hands of a party'. If only the power were in 'the hands of a party thoroughly attached to British interests and connexions, there would be a ground of mutual cordiality and confidence which would render real co-operation more probable, concessions more easy, and even submission more tolerable'. For the present he could only bear with his council, and hope for a better day.

¹ Metcalfe to Stanley, August 5, October 9, 1843, Kaye, Papers, pp. 411 ff., 435 ff.

Metcalfe's imperialism had by this time taken a definite form. The introduction of the cabinet system he viewed with the confident dismay that it would lead to independence. He mistrusted it in a colony. As a consequence he had no patience with the party system, especially as it had lifted into power 'reformers, republicans, and French'. There was much truth in the descriptions which he drew—'reformers', 'republicans', 'rebels', 'tories and family compact men', 'the hostile virulence of orangemen and repealers'—a chaos of watch-words and shibboleths in an atmosphere of undisciplined invective. The difficulty was that Metcalfe could not kill the parties—he recognized that himself—and in hating them as signs of reform, perhaps of separation, he slowly but surely drifted into the arms of the high and dry tories, who had sounded the loyal note so loud and so long that it had become pleasant in Metcalfe's willing ear. He could not believe that loyalty could be otherwise than guileless, and he was quite broken-hearted to report that 'the whole colony must at times be regarded as a party opposed to her majesty's government'. He could not be indifferent to parties: 'this indifference is scarcely possible to a governor having any spark of British feeling, when almost all who have British feelings are arrayed on one side, and all who have anti-British feelings on the other'.¹ The real difficulty lay in the fact that Metcalfe did not see that a Canadian feeling was growing up. In his eyes all citizens of the empire were British or anti-British. His duty clearly lay with the former. As a consequence he became the leader of a party in the colony in spite of all his theoretical protestations. His party was anti-Canadian. A new synthesis of empire was beginning under his eyes, and he could not grasp a Canadian party representing the vast majority of the people and protesting, through Baldwin, its loyalty to the mother country. Metcalfe believed that loyalty was the peculiar property of the 'British "family compact" party', and it seemed to him that there must be something 'rotten', to use his own word, in a protested loyalty which did not include in its ranks the tried men of British feelings.

In doubt and fear Metcalfe opened the legislature in September. A certain amount of business was got through, notably a resolution in favour of Montreal as the seat of government, a statute to prevent judges and public officials from sitting in the assembly, and a complete reform of the judicial system of Lower Canada. Two measures, however, created the fiercest controversy. A bill was passed, commonly known as 'the secret societies' bill', which constituted all secret societies, except the freemasons, illegal, and declared that their members should be held incapable of holding official appointments or of serving on juries. The measure was introduced with Metcalfe's knowledge and approval, but he reserved it, when passed by an overwhelming majority, for the sanction of the imperial authorities, which was finally refused. The opposition considered that the bill was specially aimed at the orange order and was class legislation of a particularly autocratic type; but Baldwin and La Fontaine replied that it was straining the constitution in reserving the Act. The second measure was Baldwin's attempt to secularize higher education by transferring the lands granted to King's College to a new state institution—the University of Toronto. Strachan consolidated the ranks of the church of England, and outdid himself in violence. The bill proposed, according to this champion, 'to place all forms of error on an equality with truth, by patronizing equally within the same institution an unlimited number of sects whose doctrines are absolutely irreconcilable : a principle in its nature atheistical and so monstrous in its consequences that, if successfully carried out, it would lead . . . to greater corruption than anything adopted during the madness of the French revolution . . . a fatal departure from all that is good without a parallel in the history of the world'.¹ The church papers described Baldwin's proposals as disclosing 'the true atheistical character of the popular dogma of responsible government'.² Religious feelings were aroused to extremes and the bill was making stormy progress, when Metcalfe came face to face with the impasse which he most dreaded.

¹ Metcalfe to Stanley, May 13, 1845, Kaye, Papers, pp. 449 ff.

Towards the close of November the government heard that a conservative had been appointed to a minor office without their approval. Baldwin and La Fontaine interviewed Metcalfe privately, and opened up the question of patronage at the executive council. The governor-general refused to accept their demands, and on November 26 the entire government resigned, with the exception of Dominick Daly. It is difficult to arrive at the motives which lay behind this drastic action. Apparently La Fontaine and Baldwin drove the Sydenham-Harrison resolutions to their logical conclusion and included all patronage supported by provincial funds as part of the responsibility of the ministry in power. They complained that the differences between the executive and the governor were not theoretical but actual, as appointments had been made against their advice, and proposals for appointments had been laid before him when the opportunity for advice had passed. They resented the reservation of 'the secret societies' bill' after Metcalfe had given his consent to its introduction as a government measure. They felt that they were in an anomalous position, being responsible for all acts of the executive to the legislature, and not being consulted on all acts by the governor. There was apparently a sphere in which the governor could control provincial appointments, and he maintained that the council need not defend or support in parliament his actions within that sphere.

¹ See the petition which he presented, November 6, 1843, Journals of the Legislative Assembly of Canada.

² The Church (Toronto), November 17, 1843.

Metcalfe disputed the explanations of the ministers. He declared that the statement, which has just been considered, was too full and that the issue was not on a theory of responsible government, but merely on the question of the governor-general's complete surrender to the council of his control over all appointments. He refused to accept any position of subordination which would convert patronage into party channels, 'degrade the character of his office, . . . violate his duty, and surrender the prerogative of the crown'.¹ Other interpretations of the episode were forthcoming at the time. Hincks maintained that the whole thing was part of a plan, which originated with the colonial office, to wreck Bagot's work.² Edward Gibbon Wakefield saw in it a party move, as the government was already tottering and needed to rally public opinion in its favour.³ Although Metcalfe lent some support to Wakefield's statement by referring to it in a dispatch, there is no doubt that his view of the situation had no basis in fact.¹ As for the suggestion put forward by Hincks, it can be dismissed as an insult to a man of Metcalfe's honour. Egerton Ryerson entered the contest with puerile conceptions of constitutional law, and defended Metcalfe by an interpretation of British practice, which was lashed to pieces in Sullivan's merciless satire.² The latter resolved the question into its simplest terms: if Metcalfe was right, then Canada should not have representative institutions at all, and the Sydenham-Harrison resolutions to which the colonial office had assented were meaningless. The executive claimed to be a cabinet representing a party and, as such, to have full control over the patronage of the province. Metcalfe claimed the right, not merely in theory—which was conceded—but in fact, to make appointments apart from the executive, as part of the prerogative rights of the crown. The executive defended their position as part and parcel of their conditions on taking up office. It was unfortunate that the challenge should have been over patronage, as the conservatives and Metcalfe were able to raise a kind of ethical cry over bought votes and tarnished power. But Baldwin and La Fontaine knew well enough that the same patronage would be claimed by their opponents if in office, the only difference being that Metcalfe and MacNab would call it the just reward for British loyalty.

¹ The statement of La Fontaine and Baldwin and Metcalfe's reply are in The Addresses presented to His Excellency the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles T. Metcalfe on the Occasion of the Resignation of his late Advisers (Toronto, 1844).

² Dent, Canada since the Union of 1841, vol. i, pp. 272 ff. ; cf. Hincks, The Political History of Canada between 1840 and 1855 (Montreal, 1877).

³ A Letter on the Ministerial Crisis (Kingston, 1843) ; A View of Sir Charles Metcalfe's Government in Canada (London, 1844).

Metcalfe now cast himself on the country to seek a new council, and following cabinet conventions, to get ready for a new election. Daly remained and was joined by Benjamin Viger, who deserted his compatriots after having suffered in their cause.³ Later W. H. Draper was secured and the three formed a provisional government. A war of pamphlets and newspapers, addresses and counter-addresses, broke out which knew nothing of civilized conventions. The 'Canada crisis' was debated in the imperial parliament, and Stanley served up the Sydenham-Russell correspondence of 1839 as if it were an original contribution. He also sat in judgement dividing Canadians into loyal sheep and rebel goats. The student of party politics can only regret that no one in the house of commons then knew that he had absolutely forbidden Bagot to appoint Viger to the legislative council, because he had been a traitor, whom he was now defending as a member of Metcalfe's provisional government.¹ When Metcalfe finally got together an executive council and faced the electors in November 1844, the air was charged with electricity. Bitterness passed all bounds. Virulence passed for truth, invective took the place of logic. Every conceivable weapon was pressed into service. Metcalfe himself made it clear that he considered loyalty and the British connexion were at stake, and in a reply to an address from the district of Gore he practically issued an election manifesto. He refused to surrender himself or the patronage of the crown to any executive however supported. To do so would be 'incompatible with the existence of a British colony'. He was 'responsible to the crown and the parliament and the people of the mother country' for every act which he performed.² 'He felt', says his biographer, 'that he was fighting for his sovereign against a rebellious people.' His sincerity must remain his only defence. On the eve of the election he firmly believed that there were only two issues: British connexion and supremacy or a form of government inconsistent with either.³ The elections thus took on the aspect of a grim struggle between loyalists and traitors, and the numerous and fatal riots which accompanied them were viewed as contests between the forces of the crown and rebels. The tory group rallied their supporters to a man, the Eastern Townships stood solid, Ryerson had directed the Methodists, and many a doubter finally followed the cry of loyalty rather than the dictates of his convictions. In the issue the governor's party—for such it undoubtedly was—was returned with a small majority, which by three votes gave MacNab the speakership.

¹ Metcalfe to Stanley, December 26, 1843, Kaye, Papers, pp. 422 ff.

² Egerton Ryerson, Sir Charles Metcalfe defended (Toronto, 1844); R. B. Sullivan ('Legion'), Letters on Responsible Government (Toronto, 1844).

³ See Viger's defence in La Crise ministérielle (Kingston, 1844).

¹ 'It is impossible to overlook the fact that Viger was in truth one of the most active partisans of the late disturbances . . . imprisoned on a charge of treason . . . conspicuous by his refusal to give bail for future peaceable conduct. . . . I cannot consent to confer a mark of distinction on one who was foremost in the ranks of disaffection': Stanley to Bagot, April 1, 1842, Bagot Correspondence, G. 113, p. 4.

² Kaye, Life, vol. ii, pp. 533 ff.

³ Ibid., pp. 562 ff.

The long contest ended at least in a paper victory, and Metcalfe had the satisfaction of knowing that the imperial government and even the leading men of the liberal opposition, including Lord John Russell, were on his side, while the queen conferred on him a peerage in cordial approbation of the ability and fidelity with which he had carried out the important trust confided to him.¹ He had done the work which the cabinet had sent him to do. He had deviated neither to the right hand nor to the left, and he had kept the faith. It is well that the student of these bitter days can recall the figure of a dying man, almost sightless with cancer, holding fast to his post, in order to preserve the unity of the empire which he considered was absolutely incompatible with colonial responsible government. The iron, however, entered into his soul before he retired from office. His new council exercised little influence and commanded little support. In the noise of battle a small majority had been secured, but when the tumult had died away men began to find that the war-cries were ill suited to the days of peace, and that loyalty was a poor substitute for efficient administration. For Metcalfe personally the last months in Canada were a sad revelation. The single-minded governor had become a partisan, the peace which he hoped to favour was almost outraged by civil war, and the races which were beginning to work together stood in bitter opposition as in the days of Craig and Aylmer. On the other hand, Metcalfe put the entire colonial office theory into practice. He had no conceivable use for Sydenham's ill-working paternalism or for Bagot's logical concessions. He was the ideal man for Stanley's instructions, and he proved to the imperial cabinet that it was one thing to put in practice their theory and quite another thing to make it work. Government by imperial selection had proved just as futile as government by a 'compact' or a 'clique'. The decay which had set in went on apace. Draper attempted to arrest it by trying to induce La Fontaine to join forces with the conservatives of Upper Canada.¹ He thought to obtain a working majority in each division of the province. The negotiations fell through and the decay continued until Draper was glad to resign. His successors—the so-called Sherwood-Daly ministry—could not avert the inevitable, and Elgin, with the country behind him, dissolved 'the loyal assembly' on December 6, 1847. Perhaps the most interesting by-product of Metcalfe's government was a prophecy by Baldwin that any attempt to carry on the administration by a 'double majority' would 'perpetuate distinctions, initiate animosities, sever the bonds of political sympathy, and sap the foundations of political morality'.²

¹ Kaye, Life, vol. ii, pp. 582 ff.

[AUTHORITIES.—The State Papers are in Series G. 117–22, 183, 460 (Canadian Archives). Baldwin's Correspondence is in the Reference Library, Toronto. J. W. Kaye, Life and Correspondence of Charles, Lord Metcalfe (2 vols., London, 1854), and Selections from the Papers of Lord Metcalfe (London, 1855), contain many letters and dispatches. F. Hincks, Political History (Montreal, 1877), and Reminiscences (Montreal, 1844), are of great importance. J. C. Dent, The Last Forty Years, or Canada since the Union of 1841 (2 vols., Toronto, 1881), is valuable and owes much to Hincks. The pamphlet literature is extensive and throws contemporary light on the history. It includes

¹ Correspondence between the Hon. W. H. Draper and the Hon. R. E. Caron ; and between the Hon. R. E. Caron and the Hons. L. H. La Fontaine and A. N. Morin (Montreal, 1846 ?).

² Baldwin to La Fontaine, 1845–6 (?), Baldwin Papers (Toronto Reference Library).

Ryerson, Sir Charles Metcalfe defended against the attacks of his late Councillors (Toronto, 1844); R. B. Sullivan, Letters on Responsible Government (Toronto, 1844); D. B. Viger, La Crise ministérielle (Kingston, 1844); F. Hincks, The Ministerial Crisis (Kingston, 1844); Correspondence between Hon. W. H. Draper and the Hon. R. E. Caron, and between Hon. R. E. Caron and the Hons. L. H. La Fontaine and A. N. Morin (Montreal, 1846); Addresses presented to . . . Sir Charles Metcalfe . . . on the occasion of the Resignation of his late Advisers (Toronto, 1844); The 'Crise' Metcalfe and the La Fontaine-Baldwin Cabinet defended (Quebec, 1844). Stephen Leacock, Baldwin, La Fontaine, Hincks (Toronto, 1907), is valuable especially for its use of contemporary journals. J. L. Morison, British Supremacy and Canadian Self-government, 1839-54 (Glasgow, 1919), discusses with great insight Metcalfe's failure and its significance.]

CHAPTER XVI

THE NEW COLONIAL POLICY

METCALFE's successor, Lord Cathcart, only remained in office until the Oregon boundary dispute was settled. Queen Victoria had suggested Lord Elgin's name to Stanley before the fall of the tory government.¹ The new whig ministry at once returned to the idea of a civil governor, and neglecting party divisions they appointed Elgin to work out with Earl Grey, the colonial secretary, adequate and stable administrative principles in Canada. Elgin had carried out some successful social reforms in Jamaica, but his experience was of little importance compared with the fact that he belonged to the group of liberal-minded conservatives associated in history with the person and policy of Sir Robert Peel. He thus brought with him into the visionless mazes of Canada's storm-tossed political life the traditions of calm and discriminating liberalism, of wise insight, of dispassionate objectivity, and of a freedom from doctrinaire theory which were the most permanent contributions of the Peelites to English history. In addition, he had married Lord Durham's daughter, and his advent linked up Canadian development with a name which symbolized for the vast majority of Canadians a new colonial policy. During the seven years of his régime unparalleled and almost unhopèd-for advances were made. The older tantalizing problems in local politics were settled. The race question was placed on a newer footing and foundations were laid upon which a nobler synthesis of empire has been built.

Before considering the problems which Elgin faced, it is well to sketch in bold outline the background of British opinion and to seek some justification for it. There is no general and comprehensive formula. Perhaps the best explanation of the toryism of the tories and the whiggism of the whigs in colonial affairs can be found in the still unchallenged Austinian theory of sovereignty. The most judicial and unprejudiced political thinkers could not conceive of a divided authority or of a multiplicity of cabinets giving the crown responsible advice. Other influences were at work. To the tory group, freedom was the father of independence. Had it been possible to see beyond a theory of doubtful validity, self-government meant to them separation. The only lesson which they could derive from the American revolution was that popular control ended in disloyalty, disruption, and rebellion. They aimed in colonial policy to avoid the outbreak of another political epidemic by large doses of preventive medicine, and they uniformly classed 'reformers and liberals' as dangerous germ-carriers. The whig group accepted Austin, but they gradually acquired a greater belief in liberty and a wider mistrust of over government. When it came to a point of reconciling sovereignty with liberalism, they did not find a dilemma. With little conception of empire, they believed that colonial destiny pointed to the creation in a not very remote future of new states. In this belief they did not stand alone. When an apparent logic of facts penetrated the tory mind with the choice of either self-government or independence, not a few were prepared to accept the latter rather than resist the former with force.

¹ Letters, vol. ii, p. 55.

It was a fortunate coincidence that Elgin should come to Canada at a moment when perhaps liberal-imperialism was best represented by the colonial secretary. Earl Grey had his dark moments. At times the lamp of faith burned dim. It is, however, his unique virtue that he was the only colonial secretary up to this time who had any faith at all. He brought to his work a trained, practical mind. He saw not merely the past outlined in a failure which was almost uniformly misinterpreted, and the present beset with the dangers of a very ugly dilemma. But also he saw the future in terms of neither constitutions nor laws nor theories but in those of higher values. He was a statesman for the simple reason that he was prepared to take risks, and that he refused in the final analysis to make it an article of faith that a liberal colonial policy meant the inevitable tory end or the high whig destiny. His statesmanlike faith is all the more remarkable for two reasons. He was willing to trust the untrained, untamed, uncouth colonials to work out their own future. He found a via media between the non possumus of the tory and the laissez faire of the whig in a conception of empire which is largely that of to-day. To illustrate these two points will require long quotations, but their importance in the history of the world is more than adequate justification.

In repudiating the custom of giving directions in all details of colonial policy, Grey began a new era by laying down general principles which conceded the recommendations of Durham and the demands of Howe. In a dispatch to Sir John Harvey, lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, he wrote: 'The object with which I recommend to you this course is that of making it apparent that any transfer which may take place of political power from the hands of one party in the province to those of another is the result not of an act of yours but of the wishes of the people themselves, as shown by the difficulty experienced by the retiring party in carrying on the government of the province according to the forms of the constitution. To this I attach great importance; I have therefore to instruct you to abstain from changing your executive council until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable, with such fair support from yourself as they have a right to expect, to carry on the government of the province satisfactorily and command the confidence of the legislature. Of whatsoever party your council may be composed it will be your duty to act strictly upon the principle you have yourself laid down . . . that namely “ of not identifying yourself with any one party ” ; but instead of this, “ making yourself both a mediator and moderator between the influential of all parties ”. In giving therefore all fair and proper support to your council for the time being, you will carefully avoid any acts which can possibly be supposed to imply the slightest personal objection to their opponents, and also refuse to assent to any measures which may be proposed to you by your council which may appear to you to involve an improper exercise of the authority of the crown for party rather than for public objects. In exercising, however, this power of refusing to sanction measures which may be submitted to you by your council, you must recollect that this power of opposing a check upon extreme measures proposed by the party for the time in the government depends entirely for its efficacy upon its being used sparingly and with the greatest possible discretion. A refusal to accept advice tendered to you by your council is a legitimate ground for its members to tender to you their resignation, a course they would doubtless adopt should they feel that the subject on which a difference had arisen between you and themselves was one upon which public opinion would be in their favour. Should it prove to be so, concession to their views must, sooner or later, become inevitable, since it cannot be too distinctly acknowledged that it is neither possible nor desirable to carry on the government of any of the British provinces in North America in opposition to the opinion of the inhabitants.’¹ This dispatch became Elgin’s talisman in Canada, and Grey never deviated from it. He was willing that the crown in Canada and elsewhere should accept a ministry on that ‘ system of parliamentary government which has long prevailed in the mother country ’.²

The concession followed the broad lines of distinction which Durham and Howe had drawn between local and imperial concerns. The general power of veto laid down in the Act of Union had been modified, and the governor had been given full power to assent to any laws 'which properly belonged to the internal government of the province and which did not involve what was dishonourable and unjust'.¹ Grey, however, was inclined to believe that even in local affairs there might arise occasions when the imperial cabinet was bound to interfere. His faith wavered, for example, before the idea of a Canadian tariff. The new gospel of free trade was in full tide, and Grey debated whether Canada ought to be allowed to reject the glad tidings.² Another temporary ingredient in his imperialism was a trust in the necessity of the 'moderating influence' of the home government on the excesses of colonial factions.³ Under Elgin's influence and reacting to Elgin's experience, he gradually passed to a stronger belief based on higher conceptions. Economic advantages, the prestige of empire, the glamour of power finally took on another colour. His imperialism found a moral justification, and he saw in free countries under the crown 'a powerful instrument under Providence of maintaining peace and order in many extensive regions of the earth and thereby assisting in diffusing among millions of the human race the blessings of christianity and civilization'.⁴

¹ Grey to Harvey, November 3, 1846, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 570 ff.

² Same to same, March 31, 1847, ibid., pp. 573 ff.

At the close of January 1847 Elgin arrived in Canada. He found a ministry dragging on an anaemic existence, a house of assembly which did not command popular support, the French-Canadians in a state of dangerous gloom, and the imperial relationship dubious and insecure. There was plenty of noise in the clash of parties, but he could see nothing either essential or logical in their differences. The most dangerous issue was the actual principle of government, and with it was bound up the imperial

¹ Gladstone to Cathcart, February 3, 1846, State Papers, G. 123.

² Grey to Elgin, October 25, 1847, Elgin-Grey Correspondence.

³ Same to same, March 22, 1848, ibid.

⁴ Earl Grey, The Colonial Policy of Lord John Russell, vol. i, pp. 13 ff. (2 vols., London, 1853).

connexion in respect to the governor-general's place in the scheme. Face to face with these interwoven problems, Elgin had definite convictions. An imperialist in the best sense of the word, he realized that Canada would be bound to the empire, if bound at all, by his acceptance of positions which would accord with Canadian wishes. 'My course', he wrote, 'is I think clear and plain. It may be somewhat difficult to follow occasionally, but I feel no doubt as to the direction in which it lies. I give to my ministers all constitutional support, frankly and without reserve, and the benefit of the best advice that I can afford them in their difficulties. . . . I have never concealed from them that I intended to do nothing which may prevent me from working cordially with their opponents if they are forced upon me.'¹ He said to them, 'While you continue my advisers you shall enjoy my unreserved confidence; and en revanche you shall be responsible for all acts of government'.² This position conceded responsible government. Of course Elgin saw his dual position in relation to the imperial and local legislatures. He felt that a middle course of 'moral influence' would emerge, but for the present he had no intention of falling 'on the one side into the néant of mock sovereignty, or on the other into the dirt and confusion of local factions'. His practical mind saved him from endless anxieties. He did not stop to discuss difficulties or to worry over the nicely calculated less or more of imperial or local affairs. He faced issues as they arose, without entangling himself in theories about the consequences of his decisions.

The reconstructed ministry gained no strength. Overtures to individual French-Canadians proved as useless as before, and at the close of 1847 Elgin dissolved the legislature. The new principle was clear. If the ministry were sustained they would acquire a very necessary vitality. If they were defeated they had no claim to office. Robert Baldwin's election address is of interest: 'We shall have no more representatives of the sovereign making the doctrines of the Charleses and the Jameses the standard by which to govern British subjects in the nineteenth century . . . henceforth their viceregal governments will be distinguished by adherence to the constitutional principles acknowledged by all parties in England . . . principles which will relieve her majesty's representative from the invidious position of the head of a party and will render him . . . a living spirit, and the connecting link which binds this great colony to the parent state in affectionate and prosperous union.'¹ The election went adversely for the ministry and they were heavily defeated on a vote of no confidence. Elgin at once sent for La Fontaine and Baldwin, the opposition leaders, who formed the first real cabinet in Canada. Earl Grey emphasized the change. The executive might bring in wise or foolish measures and the vital interests of the country might suffer, but he saw no middle course between accepting the verdict of the electorate and resorting to imperial coercion, which was out of the question.² Responsible government was solved by the gift itself, and the governor passing unsullied through the election approached his new sphere of 'moral influence'. The full grant came none too soon. It was a dangerous period in history, but with popular government established the province escaped influences which might have been retrograde or tragic. Elgin remained long enough in Canada to show that cabinet government had few of the terrors which its opponents feared. He gave full support to his executive independent of, and often against, his personal feelings and convictions. He taught the Canadians the true meaning of the constitutional convention. La Fontaine and Baldwin, 'the rebel and disloyal leaders', found in the governor an undisguised willingness to support them to the full constitutional limit. When their party passed from power, he turned to his bitterest personal opponent, Sir Allan MacNab, and accepted a ministry formed by him with equally full constitutional recognition.

¹ Elgin to Grey, July 13, 1847, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 577 ff.

² Same to Cumming Bruce September 1852, ibid., pp. 589 ff.

¹ Baldwin to the electors of York, December 8, 1847, Baldwin Papers, [A], E. 6-7, 29 (15) (Ontario Archives). Elgin used the same terms in defining, at the close of his régime, the position of the governor—'the link which connects the mother country and the colony': Elgin to Sir George Grey, December 18, 1854, Kennedy, op. cit., p. 591.

² Grey to Elgin, February 22, 1848, Elgin-Grey Correspondence.

The establishment of responsible government decided a principle, and in doing so certain corollaries followed. The office of governor-general took on a new aspect. The governor was lifted 'above the strife of parties' and ceased to be a machine for registering 'rescripts from Downing Street'. His influence became 'wholly moral—an influence of suasion, sympathy, and moderation which [softened] the temper, while it [elevated] the aims of local politics'. Elgin found his position transfigured and transformed. Instead of being an object of suspicion to reformers and the peculiar private preserve of 'loyalists' with all the undignified consequences of such a place, he acquired a remarkable influence. His opinion was respected, his advice sought. He became a source of imperial faith which had suffered so tragically through the obscurity of past definitions.¹ The most remarkable answer to Metcalfe's passionate cry of 'What is to become of the governor?' is Elgin's: 'In Jamaica there was no responsible government, but I had not half the power I have [in Canada] with my constitutional and changing cabinet.'²

In addition, the French-Canadian problem was placed in a just setting out of which national salvation arose in the future. Elgin gave the lie direct to Durham's policy of denationalization. He recognized the futility of attempting to suppress race, and he saw that such attempts only succeeded in giving it renewed vigour. No repression would anglicize the French; it might succeed in driving them into the arms of the United States. 'Let them feel, on the other hand, that their religion, their habits, their prepossessions, their prejudices if you will, are more considered and respected here than in other portions of this vast continent: who will venture to say that the last hand which waves the British flag on American ground may not be that of a French-Canadian?'¹ At the opening of the legislature he announced that the imperial parliament had placed French on a level with English as an official language, and for the first time the governor read his speech in both languages. He never lost sight of the dangers of nationalism, and he was fully aware of the special and peculiar problem of French-Canadian race solidarity. In attempting to overcome it, he abandoned the useless methods of trying to detach influential men and to incorporate them in a 'loyal' cabinet. He reverted to Bagot's policy. He aimed to nullify as much as possible the consciousness of distinct origins in a general scheme of constitutional development. In linking La Fontaine with Baldwin he recognized the political unity of Canada, and he established a principle which for better or worse held the field till federation. He learned too that disintegrating radicalism was least likely to flourish in French Canada. He foresaw, if he did not actually initiate, that Anglo-French political combination which was later to emerge as the constructive force of liberal-conservatism and to give John A. Macdonald his strongest hold on ministerial power. Above all he gave French Canada justice. The rebellion losses bill² will serve not only to illustrate this point, but to throw contemporary light on the new-born principle of government, the new position of the governor-general, and the relationship between the colony and the mother country.

¹ Elgin to Cumming Bruce, September 1852, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 589 ff.

² Theodore Walrond, Letters and Journals of James, Eighth Earl of Elgin, p. 125 (London, 1872).

The story of the bill is too well known to need retelling at any length. Previous governments had undertaken to provide compensation for destruction during the rebellions. Much money had already been expended in Canada West, and Metcalfe's parliament had planned a scheme to include both divisions of the province. Commissioners had been appointed to examine claims and to sift rebels from non-rebels. The matter then did not originate under Elgin and the reform ministry. There were several cross-currents. If the measure were withheld La Fontaine and Baldwin would not continue in office. Elgin knew that they had the electors behind them and that he could not grant responsible government with one hand and take it away with the other. In addition, he believed that a measure of justice was due to French Canada. Doubtless there was a danger that public money might go to some who had been in arms, although the fact was beyond proof. He feared that civil war, if not an international complication with the United States, might arise if the recrudescence of the 'loyalty cry' were allowed to control the situation. Responsible government, the place of the French-Canadians, the impartiality of the government, and the general good faith of the imperial cabinet were on their trial. In due course the bill passed with a majority in each division of the province. Fierce opposition arose in the tory ranks and Elgin was petitioned either to refuse assent or to reserve the bill. The issues before him were clear-cut. His ministers were responsible ministers. The measure was a Canadian measure. He refused what appeared to him the weak course of throwing the complicated burden on the home government. He determined to bear it himself, and he assented to the bill.¹

¹ Elgin to Grey, May 4, 1848, ibid., p. 54.

² 12 Victoria, c. 58.

Scenes of disgraceful licence followed. Elgin was almost killed. The parliament house was looted and burned, and for a time mob law prevailed. Elgin remained perfectly calm, refused to allow the military to handle the situation, and left self-government to work out its own solution. In one of his most penetrating dispatches he analysed the mentality of the 'loyal' rioters. For his position he made neither defence nor excuse. He made it perfectly clear that a minority had had their feelings hurt, and that the turmoil was only due to a peculiar type of loyalty which claimed a right to regulate by violence what could not be gained by constitutional means. In the hands of others this was rebellion, with them it was accounted righteousness.¹ The bill was the reductio ad absurdum of 'family compact' claims. Every possible constitutional force was on Elgin's side, and tory loyalty was proved to be only the older monopoly of privilege in a newer setting. As privilege receded down the democratic tide, loyalty and imperialism were not so conspicuous. When the annexation movement was at its height not a few of the 'loyalists' longed for the flesh-pots of Egypt and joined with extremists in promoting a movement opposition to which had been the strongest force in their political raison d'être. This aspect of the episode needs little comment, but the measure had a most important influence. Responsible government was vindicated. French Canada was convinced of the sincerity of the concession, and the 'reds' never acquired any lasting influence. The 'family compact' was dissolved in political death, and John A. Macdonald was already beginning to see in the future a combination of parties in which race and privilege were to surrender their places to constitutional nationalism. In the house of commons the whole affair was canvassed. Russell and Grey defended Elgin and acknowledged the right of Canada to legislate on the matter. The majority of the Peelites voted with the government. The tories reproduced the 'loyalist' cry of 'compensating rebels' and 'French domination'. Gladstone pleaded that, as virtual rebels might receive public funds, the Act be either disallowed or an amendment passed in Canada to provide for clearer definitions. He appeared to believe that the measure was beyond colonial legislative competency. The debates led to a letter from Hincks, then in London, in the columns of The Times, which deserves a distinct place in Canadian history.¹ He poured scorn on the trite meaningless phrases, the party shibboleths which passed for arguments. He claimed a share for the Canadian government and their supporters in the loyalty which British and Canadian Tories seemed to consider their peculiar monopoly. He pointed out that imperial criticism would need to rely on facts and on judicial estimates of colonial feeling, otherwise it was 'very unsafe for parties at a distance of three thousand miles to interfere in Canadian affairs'. The letter was a polite but firm request to England to mind its own business.

¹ Elgin to Grey, March 14, 1849, Elgin-Grey Correspondence.

Elgin to Grey, April 30, 1849. Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 579 ff.

Another delicate situation arose out of inconsiderate and inconsistent imperial actions.² The Canadian Corn Act of 1843 had given Canadian wheat and flour preference in the British market. Large quantities of American wheat were imported to Canada, which gained preferential treatment when sold as Canadian flour. Canadians had invested much capital in making provision for handling the extensive trade. Like a bolt from the blue, with no thought of the consequences in component parts of the empire, the imperial government annulled colonial preference and lowered the walls of protection. As a consequence, bankruptcy swept over Canadian business life and economic gloom settled down on the country. Property became utterly worthless and the public credit of the province ceased to exist. Elgin confessed that he did not know how the Canadians kept their heads. Peaceful annexation, however, was openly advocated, and with the political crisis over the rebellion losses bill it gained wide support.³ Elgin blamed the unskilled policy which

¹ The Times, June 20, 1849.

² Walrond, op. cit., p. 60.

³ The annexation manifesto and Elgin's dispatches connected with it are in Egerton and Grant, op. cit., pp. 336 ff. Consult C. D. Allin and G. M. Jones, Annexation, Preferential Trade, and Reciprocity: An Outline of the Canadian Annexation Movement of 1849-50 (Toronto, 1911), and C. D. Allin, 'The British adopted free trade in 1846 and retained the navigation acts till 1849. He dealt summarily with manifestoes, and officials who had signed them were removed from office. But there was no doubt that a serious mistrust of Great Britain was widespread. He finally rallied the commercial classes by negotiating a reciprocity treaty with the United States and by convincing the imperial government of its necessity. Even then his difficulties did not disappear. When he was doing his utmost to bind Canada to the empire and to drive in double harness a colonial and an imperial cabinet, the prime minister of England was addressing the house of commons on the empire and began to anticipate a day when responsible government would have prepared the colonies for decent but inevitable independence. Elgin took up the challenge, which almost moved Baldwin to tears. 'You must renounce the habit', he wrote to Grey, 'of telling the colonies that the "colonial" is a provisional existence; you must allow them to believe that, without severing the bonds which unite them to Great Britain, they may attain the degree of perfection and of social and political development to which organized communities of freemen have a right to aspire. . . . Is not the question at issue a most momentous one? What is it indeed but this: Is the queen of England to be the sovereign of an empire, growing, expanding, strengthening itself from age to age, striking its roots deep into fresh earth and drawing new supplies of vitality from virgin soils? Or is she to be, for all essential purposes of might and power, monarch of Great Britain and Ireland merely—her place and that of her line in the world's history determined by the productiveness of 12,000 square miles of a coal formation, which is being rapidly exhausted, and the duration of the social and political organization over which she presides dependent on the annual expatriation, with a view to its eventual alienation, of the surplus swarms of her born subjects ? ' ¹ ' I have been possessed (I use the word advisedly, for I fear that most persons in England still consider it a case of possession) with the idea that it is possible to maintain on this soil of North America and in the face of republican America, British connexion and British institutions, if you give the latter freely and trustingly. Faith, when it is sincere, is always catching ; and I have imparted this faith more or less thoroughly to all Canadian statesmen with whom I have been in official relationship since 1848 and to all intelligent Englishmen with whom I have come in contact since 1850.' ²

Before considering the new colonial policy in the Maritime Provinces, it is necessary to take a closer view of some other aspects of Canadian life, in order to understand the reorientation of parties which took place before Elgin left Canada. The La Fontaine-Baldwin ministry was baffled by two questions. The clergy reserves, in spite of Sydenham's legislation, remained a bone of contention and the demand for their secularization gained strength. On the one hand, Bishop Strachan was compassing heaven and earth to maintain a privileged place for his communion ; on the other, George Brown was leading an attack on the status quo in the Globe, which was in reality the first blast of a new radicalism. The ministry was divided. La Fontaine favoured Baldwin against secularization, and they seem to have had Elgin's support ; but the executive contained many who were opposed to their leaders. The moderation of the government came in for increased criticism both in the legislature and outside. Secondly, seigniorial tenure had become an anachronism as the alienation fines were a heavy burden with land a commercial commodity. La Fontaine felt that he could not handle the matter, and this lent further weakness to the party in power. A new political alinement, slow but sure, was also going on in the province. The liberal party in Canada

¹ Elgin to Grey, March 23, 1850, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 583 ff.

² Elgin to Cumming Bruce, September 1852, ibid., pp. 589 ff.

West was breaking into moderate reformers and radicals or 'clear grits'. When George Brown finally brought his fiery personality to the service of the latter and linked up extreme anti-papal views with extreme reform it was clear that party changes lay near at hand. In Canada East a similar but less-pronounced cleavage was visible. A 'rouge' group arose, who were virtually republicans. Never numerically strong, they possessed fine debating powers and often brilliant gifts, which, however, failed to move the French-Canadians, whose liberalism, now that their place in the sun had been secured, took on its natural conservative colour. Finally La Fontaine and Baldwin felt that their work had been accomplished, and in October 1851 'the great administration' closed. Hincks and Morin reconstructed the ministry with two 'clear grits', Malcolm Cameron and John Rolph. Like most similar movements, the scheme failed in its object. The 'clear grits' refused to rally to the support of the government. The government was sustained in the elections at the close of the year and by practical legislation they staved off defeat. A 'Canadian Reform Bill' was passed which increased the representation of each division of the province to sixty-five and made provision for a redistribution of constituencies. An address was carried praying for freedom to reconstruct the legislative council on an elective basis, which was finally embodied in an imperial Act.¹ The legislative council, however, rejected a bill on seigniorial tenure.

There were soon signs of disintegration. Hincks became involved in financial transactions which brought public discredit to the ministry, and he was no more prepared to deal with the clergy reserves than his predecessors, although he had reformed the cabinet with that as an issue. The fall of Lord John Russell and the advent of the Derby ministry provided an excuse for delay. When the Aberdeen ministry promised enabling legislation he was as little ready as before. A sudden appeal to the country in June 1854 did not strengthen his hands. The 'clear grits' and the tories combined and the government resigned in September. Parties, however, were not reconstructed on any logical basis. The extreme liberals hoped that radicals from both Canada East and Canada West would coalesce and by drawing moderate reformers command political power. A new hand was at the helm in the person of John A. Macdonald. The tories and moderate men of Canada West joined against the radicals, and it was not difficult to effect an alliance with the French-Canadian ministerialists. Thus there came into being, in the MacNab-Morin ministry of September 1854, the liberal-conservative party of Canadian history. In the following January the ministry was reconstructed. Morin was elevated to the bench and his place taken by E. P. Taché. In 1856 the reformers of Canada West grew tired of MacNab. Macdonald was behind the revolt, and in May 1856 the Taché-Macdonald ministry was formed. In the following year Taché retired and power passed into the hands of Macdonald and Cartier, both of whom had now become dominant figures. Liberal-conservatism was strong in its leaders and in the borrowed programme of reform. The opposition had for the moment no vital planks in its platform and extensive legislative achievement gave the ministry power. The clergy reserves and the seigniorial tenure were finally settled. The legislative council was made elective. The reciprocity treaty was ratified. The establishment of a militia system bore witness to a growing consciousness of self-governing capacity. On the other hand, the settlement of outstanding questions robbed party politics of definite dividing lines. The problem which now faced the Canadas was that of making responsible government efficient and workable. When the big accomplishments were over, difficulties loomed up which became potent forces for change, and combining with other issues over which Canada had no control postulated a newer and wider development.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 592 ff. (17 & 18 Victoria, c. 118).

While Elgin was carrying out reform in the Canadas advances were taking place in the Maritime Provinces. In Nova Scotia Lord Falkland took office on Sir Colin Campbell's removal, and hopes were entertained that Howe would succeed in getting his principles accepted under a lieutenant-governor who was not only a whig, but was sent to take the place of a man whose resignation had been virtually forced on the imperial cabinet. Falkland, however, did not prove the promised deliverer. He had nothing to offer but a weak imitation of the Sydenham-Metcalf policy. Howe had accepted a place in the executive council, but his presence there only emphasized the fact that a 'ministry of all the talents' were hopelessly divided. A general election failed to decide whether tories or reformers should govern. The election resulted in an almost even balancing of parties, and the representatives of neither resigned from the executive. The appointment of a pronounced anti-reformer to the council forced Howe's hand and he resigned with his colleagues. The contest practically resolved itself into a personal one between Falkland and 'the tribune of Nova Scotia'. Howe brought to it an unrivalled satiric pen and a tongue which knew how to combine effectively political arguments with rugged native humour. He had behind him the general support of the people, who watched with interested enthusiasm the progress of a struggle which drove Falkland from office in 1846. To his successor, Sir John Harvey, Grey laid down those principles of colonial government to which reference has already been made. At first he tried to arrange a coalition ministry, but the liberals refused to take office. He then forwarded to Grey memoranda prepared by the council in which a request was made for further light on methods of administration and a defence was set up of Metcalfe's system.¹ Grey amplified in his reply his general adherence to the principle of responsible government. He emphasized the necessity for the executive government possessing the support of the house of assembly, and he drew a distinction between public offices similar to that existing in the United Kingdom. He advised that those of attorney-general, solicitor-general, provincial secretary, and possibly two others should be political, but that others should be governed by the British rules of permanent tenure.¹ When the dispatch was laid before the legislature, the assembly which had been elected in August 1847 defeated the ministry, which resigned with the exception of the provincial secretary. The opposition, relying on Grey's enumeration, refused to take office and the secretary was finally removed by the exercise of the prerogative of the crown. The reform ministry were not prepared to allow the provincial treasurer to hold his appointment, and insisted on his removal without compensation to make room for a division of his duties under a receiver-general and a financial secretary. Sir John Harvey attempted in an unofficial way to induce the ministry to reconsider their proposals. When he failed, he gave the executive his full support and Grey defended him against an attack in the house of commons.² The coming of responsible government in Nova Scotia thus coincided with its advent in the Canadas. The struggle had not been so bitter, and there were no tragic regrets, no fatal extremes. In his most impetuous moments Howe never deviated from constitutional methods. It is impossible to find in the records of the Nova Scotian reformers a disloyal expression or a separatist innuendo, although they had their share of opprobrious epithets from their tory and official opponents. When Elgin was passing through dark waters because he was brave enough to be consistent, and when disgruntled toryism was joining hands in the Canadas with revolutionary extremists, Howe lent the weight of his brilliant pen to the cause which he had so ably served.

¹ Harvey to Grey, February 2, 1847, Parliamentary Papers, H. C. 621 (1848), p. 15.

¹ Grey to Harvey, March 31, 1847, Kennedy, op. cit. pp. 573 ff.

² Parliamentary Papers, H. C. 621 (1848), pp. 33 ff.

Liberal though he was, he possessed that great asset of constructive moderation, backed by a grasp of political thought, to which no colonial statesman has made more important contributions.

In New Brunswick reform did not move public opinion as quickly as elsewhere. During the régime of Sir John Harvey, Russell's dispatch¹ on the tenure of offices was accepted as the virtual concession of responsible government. When Russell laid down that the holders of the chief administrative offices should be removed whenever any 'sufficient motive of public policy demanded it', Harvey saw that opposition to these in the assembly would afford sufficient guarantee that the conditions had been fulfilled. The elections of 1842 saw the defeat of the liberal party. It took a flagrant act of favouritism to educate the electorate. Harvey's successor, Sir William Colebrooke, evidently thought that he had the power, apart from local advice, to appoint any one whom he liked to office. Acting on principles similar to those enunciated by Metcalfe in Canada he proceeded in 1845 to fill the vacant office of provincial secretary, and worse still he gave the appointment to his own son-in-law. This was more than even a conservative executive could stand, and those who had opposed responsible government in 1842 now resigned as a protest against the lieutenant-governor's action. The colonial office refused to sanction the appointment, but the episode served to break up the typical ministry and to arouse interest in the general issue. The reform leaders who had temporarily followed the Sydenham scheme informed Colebrooke that they also must oppose his methods, which were too violent. The conservatives maintained that he had no right to appoint some one entirely unknown to the country; the liberals, that he had no right to appoint any one, known or unknown. The reformers won the elections of 1848, and when the dispatches on responsible government were laid on the table the assembly formally approved by resolution of the principle.¹

¹ See above, p. 196.

In Prince Edward Island the demand for responsible government arose out of a quarrel between the lieutenant-governor, Sir H. V. Huntley, and the speaker of the assembly over a proposal to increase the former's salary. From this episode public opinion rallied to the idea that the assembly should control all local expenditure. The opinion was also gaining ground that a responsible executive might prove capable of settling the peculiar land problems of the colony. In 1847 an address was forwarded from the assembly to the imperial cabinet, asking that an executive of four chosen from the popular party should constitute a responsible government.² The colonial office replied that the colony was in a position to pay official salaries, excluding that of the lieutenant-governor, but that the small and scattered population was against the complete system of government asked for in the address. The assembly replied expressing its willingness to assume the financial burden if responsible government were granted, all the revenues and crown lands surrendered, and all claims to quit-rents abandoned. The colonial secretary conceded every request except the first. An election resulted in the strengthening of the reformers and a vote of want of confidence was carried on the motion of George Coles, the reform leader. To bring the matter to a head the assembly refused to vote supplies and was prorogued by the lieutenant-governor, Sir Donald Campbell, who censured them for their 'premeditated neglect of their legislative functions'. When they reassembled in 1851, Sir Alexander Bannerman laid before them a dispatch in which he was instructed to concede the full demands of the reformers. Thus within the same decade of the nineteenth century the representative institutions of British North America were made ready for further constitutional development by the grant of responsible government.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, H. C. 621 (1848), p. 40.

² Ibid. (1847), 566.

[AUTHORITIES.—The documents are in the Elgin-Grey Correspondence (Canadian Archives) ; Egerton and Grant, Canadian Constitutional Development (Toronto, 1907) ; Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759-1915 (Oxford, 1918) ; T. Walrond, Letters and Journals of James, Eighth Earl of Elgin (London, 1872) ; State Papers, G., vols. 126-47, 281-5, 461-2 ; J. H. Chisholm, The Speeches and Public Letters of Joseph Howe (2 vols., Halifax, 1909). Of biographies, the most useful are J. W. Longley, Joseph Howe (Toronto, 1904) ; G. M. Grant, Joseph Howe (Toronto, 1904) ; J. Hannay, Wilmot and Tilley (Toronto, 1907) ; J. G. Bourinot, Lord Elgin (Toronto, 1903) ; G. M. Wrong, The Earl of Elgin (London, 1905). Joseph Pope, Sir John Macdonald (2 vols., Ottawa, 1894), and O. D. Skelton, The Life and Times of Sir A. T. Galt (Toronto, 1920), contain much valuable material. Lord Grey, The Colonial Policy of Lord John Russell's Administration (2 vols., London, 1852), is important for imperial policy. F. Hincks, The Political History of Canada between 1840 and 1855 (Montreal, 1877), is essential. J. L. Morison, British Supremacy and Canadian Self-government, 1839-54 (Glasgow, 1919), contains the only adequate study of the Elgin-Grey correspondence (cf. the same author, 'Lord Elgin in Canada', Scottish Historical Review, October 1912, pp. 1 ff.). For the clergy reserves question, H. E. Egerton, Selected Speeches of Sir William Molesworth (London, 1903), and C. Lindsey, The History and Present Position of the Clergy Reserves (Toronto, 1851), should be consulted.]

CHAPTER XVII

THE FAILURE OF RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT IN THE CANADAS

RESPONSIBLE government settled some problems and inevitably created others. Political energy was diverted from constitutional discussions which had broken up the life of the province for generations, and almost every group recognized that for good or ill the principle of government had passed for ever out of the realms of debate. The great step had been taken, and there was no possibility of retracing it without irretrievable or tragic disaster. As a consequence the old tory party could not in future hope to rally the province to their support as the sole guardians of loyalty and the unique repositories for privilege and patronage. Nor could they hope that their influence would continue to resolve in their favour any doubts which might arise at the colonial office. With the close of Lord Elgin's administration the governor-general passes more and more into the position which Baldwin and Elgin saw must be his under the new system. The nearest approach to independence was in 1858, when Sir Edmund Head would not grant George Brown's request for a dissolution, and in 1862, when Lord Monck passed over the more influential M. H. Foley and sent for John Sandfield Macdonald to form a ministry. Head's action was interpreted as a party trick engineered by John A. Macdonald; but he acted in a strictly constitutional way, nor yet did he lower the dignity of his office. Monck's action was also constitutional, and was inspired by motives which are beyond dispute. In the actual administration the change was soon apparent. The executive council had become a cabinet and the conventions of cabinet government were early brought into play. The governor's presence at meetings became as anomalous as the king's in England. The royal instructions made his presence normally necessary and cast doubts on executive acts carried out in council when he was absent. In 1858 the law officers of the crown could offer no concessions other than that during the physical incapacity of the governor 'measures might be taken by the council with his subsequent concurrence'.¹ Head outlined the custom which was growing up in Canada. He supported it by stating that the Canadian law officers did not think that his attendance was necessary to give legal effect to executive actions, and he added the expression of a personal belief that with the grant of responsible government it was 'most inexpedient as a general rule that the governor should be present during the discussion in council of particular measures. He is at liberty at all times to go into council and discuss any measures which he or the council thinks require it, but his presence as a regular and indispensable rule would check all freedom of debate and embarrass himself as well as his advisers'.² Responsible government meant that active leadership would pass from British to Canadian hands. The prime minister of Canada became the important figure, and the governor-general gradually assumed a place analogous to that of the monarch in Great Britain. The dispatches to the colonial office took on a formal and business-like monotony compared with those before 1854. The constitutional powers of the governor-general gradually declined and his real influence became moral and personal.

Indeed, during this period there is early evidence of what was recognized during the Great War as a new and distinct triumph for dominion autonomy. Canadian ministers went on frequent missions to London and discussed Canadian affairs directly, and not through the governor, with the imperial government. The equality of empire cabinets was already on the horizon of constitutional progress. Perhaps the most illuminative utterances on the dissolution of the older relationship between the crown and the province were uttered by George Brown during the crisis over the choice of a provincial capital, to which as many cities and towns laid claim as sought the honour of being considered Homer's birthplace. The weakness of party government resulted in the leaving of the decision to the queen. In reality this meant that Sir Edmund Head would be consulted. To oppose her supposed choice was branded as disloyalty. Brown repudiated the charge, and with a clear grasp of the position now fully conceded declared, 'Do you think her majesty cares a straw where the seat of government of Canada is fixed? People prate about our insulting the crown because we speak out what nine-tenths of the whole people think; but do you ever hear from such people anything about insulting the people? If ever an insult was given to a people, it was when the legislature and government of Canada declared that the Canadian people were unable to settle for themselves where their seat of government ought to be, and that they must go to a colonial minister three thousand miles off, who never had his foot on Canadian soil, to settle it for them under backstairs advice. I voted against that reference; I used every influence to prevent so ungracious a task being thrown on the imperial government; I urged that they should not act upon the reference. . . . The first thing in my consideration was the interests of the whole people of Canada and not servility to Mr. Labouchere or any other colonial minister. I yield to no man for a single moment in loyalty to the crown of England and in humble respect and admiration of her majesty. But what has this purely Canadian question to do with loyalty? It is a most dangerous and ungracious thing to couple the name of her majesty with an affair so entirely local and one as to which the sectional feelings of the people are so excited.'¹

¹ Labouchere to Head, January 25, 1858.

² Head to Labouchere, March 4, 1858.

¹ Alexander Mackenzie, The Life and Speeches of the Hon. George Brown, p. 272 (Toronto, 1882).

Responsible government created problems. No effort had been made to settle its contents. It was fortunate that this was so. An attempt to classify imperial and colonial concerns would only have proved a source of friction, and, worse still, would have tended to curtail elasticity, to narrow readjustments by rigidity, and to rule out the reasonableness of give and take through which advance and development come. In relation to tariff and defence it is possible to see two issues. Firstly, provincial self-consciousness began to claim a wider sphere for responsible government and the challenge shaded off into a further challenge to the formal ties of empire. For a considerable time Canada accepted the position that the imperial government should regulate the tariffs of the empire. A fine distinction had been attempted between seaborne commerce and inland commerce with the United States; but, broadly speaking, the imperial regulation of foreign trade was recognized, and Hincks in 1849 had laid it down that the imperial connexion would have no meaning if Great Britain were shut out of the colony's markets. Parallel with the growth in government there developed colonial business instincts and self-confidence. The business men looked for economic expansion through a protective tariff, and the Canadian government were not unwilling to help them as the province was badly in need of increased revenue. In 1859 Alexander Galt, the finance minister, increased the duties on manufactured articles, and thus incidentally affected certain British concerns. Those of Sheffield appealed to the Duke of Newcastle, the secretary of state for the colonies. Their language was hardly tactful: 'It cannot be regarded as less than indecent and a reproach, that while for fifteen years the government, the greatest statesmen, and the press of this country have been not only advocating but practising the principles of free trade, the government of one of her most important colonies should have been advocating monopoly and protection. . . . We conceive that her majesty's government has a right to demand that what revenue is needed shall be raised in some other way than that which is opposed to the acknowledged commercial policy of the imperial government and destructive of the interests of those manufacturing towns of Great Britain which trade with Canada.' Newcastle was hardly less tactless. In forwarding the memorial to Head and expressing his opinion that 'probably' he would advise that the royal assent be given to the authenticated act of the legislature, he digressed to discuss the dangers of protection, the virtues of free trade, and to lecture the provincial government.¹

Galt drew up a report which was forwarded, with the approval of the Canadian executive, to the colonial office. We are not here concerned with the economic aspects of Galt's reply, but the constitutional statement is of great importance. Galt pointed out his surprise that the representations of a provincial town in England should have had such weight as to produce what amounted to a censure on almost three millions of people. The deliberate acts of the Canadian legislature should not have been condemned merely in answer to a memorial 'professedly actuated by selfish motives'. Elementary courtesy demanded not only that the legislature should have been given an opportunity to explain its policy, but that such representations should not be allowed to produce such effects. Since the possibility of disallowance had arisen Galt felt it was 'the duty of the provincial government distinctly to state what they consider to be the position and rights of the Canadian legislature'. These he outlined in unambiguous terms: 'Respect to the imperial government must always dictate the desire to satisfy them that the policy of this country is neither hastily nor unwisely formed; and that due regard is had to the interests of the mother country as well as of the province. But the government of Canada, acting for its legislature and people, cannot, through those feelings of deference which they owe to the imperial authorities, in any manner waive or diminish the right of the people of Canada to decide for themselves both as to the mode and extent to which taxation shall be imposed. The provincial ministry are at all times ready to afford explanations in regard to the acts of the legislature to which they are party ; but, subject to their duty and allegiance to her majesty, their responsibility in all general questions of policy must be to the provincial parliament, by whose confidence they administer the affairs of the country ; and in the imposition of taxation it is so plainly necessary that the administration and the people should be in accord, that the former cannot admit responsibility or acquire approval beyond that of the local legislature. Self-government would be utterly annihilated if the views of the imperial government were to be preferred to those of the people of Canada. It is therefore the duty of the present government distinctly to affirm the right of the Canadian legislature to adjust the taxation of the people in the way they deem best, even if it should unfortunately happen to meet the disapproval of the imperial ministry. Her majesty cannot be advised to disallow such acts, unless her advisers are prepared to assume the administration of the affairs of the colony irrespective of the views of its inhabitants. The imperial government are not responsible for the debts and engagements of Canada. They do not maintain its judicial, educational, or civil service. They contribute nothing to the internal government of the country, and the provincial legislature acting through a ministry directly responsible to it has to make provision for all these wants. They must necessarily claim and exercise the widest latitude as to the nature and extent of the burdens to be placed upon the industry of the people. The provincial government believes that his grace must share their own convictions on this important subject ; but, as serious evil would have resulted had his grace taken a different course, it is wiser to prevent future complication by distinctly stating the position that must be maintained by every Canadian administration.' ¹

¹ Parliamentary Papers, H. C. 400 (1864), pp. 7 ff.

John A. Macdonald defended the position taken up by the Canadian executive. He could not surrender the right of self-taxation as the Canadian people desired. 'The ministers of Canada dependent on her people' would have failed in their duty had they not protested against an interference, explicit or implied, by the colonial office. Newcastle at least 'owned up' that he was wrong.² Further correspondence took place on the economic issues, but Galt's memorandum closed the era of attempted control. From that time the legal and constitutional right has been conceded that Canada can regulate its economic policy without any fear of such remonstrances as those addressed by Newcastle to the Canadian government.

With trade autonomy conceded and with the outbreak of the American civil war, the question of Canadian defence came into prominence. The old idea that the imperial government should provide practical defence in return for trade advantages lost its logic with Galt's tariff, and there soon arose in England a demand against supporting British troops in Canada now that preference over other nations had disappeared. A gradual reduction began of imperial regiments in Canada, and the question of defence automatically forced itself on the Canadian government. A good deal was done, but in an inefficient manner, and the financial difficulties of 1859 produced further economy. With the antagonizing of the North in the Civil War and the apparent British sympathy with the South a storm gathered. The Trent affair increased the dangers. The newspapers of the United States indulged in an orgie of yellow journalism. If Canada were not immediately attacked, the northern army would annex it later in the hour of their triumph. Fortunately

¹ Canada Sessional Papers (1860), No. 38, pp. 4 ff.; Parliamentary Papers, H. C. 400 (1864), pp. 11 ff.; partially in Egerton and Grant, op. cit., pp. 349 ff.

² Galt to John A. Macdonald, December 14, 1859, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, p. 7 (Oxford, 1921).

Lincoln and Lord Lyons, the British ambassador at Washington, kept their heads. There was just a danger, however, that the people on each side of the international line might sweep their governments off their feet in one of those outbursts of group emotionalism so characteristic of the North American continent. Preparations of some sort appeared necessary. The government prepared a militia bill after a commission had examined the difficulties of a peculiar and explosive situation. The house of assembly rejected the proposals and the government was defeated.

The motives for the rejection need not be discussed here. Monck was inclined to think that the measure was merely the occasion of an inevitable defeat and that the administration had already lost the confidence of the assembly.¹ In imperial relations, however, the history is of great interest. There broke out in England a panic of abuse at Canadian blindness and infatuation. The tired Northern armies would turn with joy to the rich provinces, and Great Britain could not bear the expenses of defence. Instead of rejecting the bill, Canada should have risen to a man and protested against its miserable and insufficient provisions. This attitude of mind was deeply resented in Canada. Sober criticism pointed out that if there was a war, the responsibility would lie at the door of British diplomacy, and that while Canada would bear her part of the burden, it could not be expected to assume the entire weight in a quarrel originating in a foreign policy in which Canada was a negligible quantity. The Canadian government embodied this defence in a careful and moderate memorandum.² The motives behind this do not concern the issue. The great point was that Canada in receiving responsible government had reached a place where Canadians, not British, were going to decide the policy. The documents of the episode disclose no wilful plan to dislocate the defence of the empire. The public opinion of Great Britain was guilty of an interpretation due to ignorance and panic. All that had happened was that Canadians were untying another legal and formal knot in the bands of empire. Responsible government had brought the right to tax as the people liked, and it had brought the right to provide defence as the people liked. Canada resented the general outcry in the mother country because it seemed too much like an unofficial attempt to dictate a policy to the province. As a matter of fact, the 'militia crisis' helped in another way. When the everyday pedestrian workings of responsible government are considered and their defects disclosed, constructive minds will be seen at work on the Canadian problem as a whole, and in it national defence became an important and cumulative force.

¹ Monck to Newcastle, July 28, 1863.

² Canada Sessional Papers (1863), No. 15; cf. Journals of the Legislative Assembly of Canada (1865), pp. 9 ff.

The distinction between self-government and responsible government should at this point be made perfectly clear. While self-government connoted the domestic control by Canada over its own affairs, responsible government implied a particular set of institutions through which the legislative power and executive authority were brought into relation to the will of the people. In the British constitutional development this meant cabinet and party government. The significance of the distinction lies in the fact that at this juncture in Canadian history the general advance in self-government was vitiated by a general stagnation in the process of responsible government. With the settlement of the larger questions, and with the formation of the liberal-conservative party, there was little place left for distinct platforms. The opposition offered by the 'clear grits' and the 'rouges' was such that it could not command a working support of the province. The former were too radical for their day, and the anti-papal views of Brown were such that the party could not hope to draw any aid from Lower Canada. The

'rouges' were mistrusted throughout the country. Party government, then, degenerated in a recurrence of dissolutions and elections which settled nothing. There were, too, fundamental difficulties in the constitution, which loomed up with the disappearance of the more important issues. French Canada had been recognized by the Quebec Act and by the Constitutional Act as a distinct race group. The hoped-for blending of the two peoples had never taken place. The events of 1837-8, the Durham Report, the Sydenham experiment, the reaction against Bagot's system, the recognition of a dual ministry under La Fontaine and Baldwin, all combined to emphasize the fact that two distinct races were living together in one province and that each was prepared to guard its privileges. Bagot and Elgin tried to divert the race consciousness of the French-Canadians into political channels, but both were forced to recognize political groupings based on nationality, and every ministry from 1849 on was constructed on the foundations of representation from Canada East and from Canada West, with practically a prime minister from each division. As a consequence there grew up a kind of unwritten convention that a government should have a majority in east and west. At times the cabinet resigned if defeated in one division, at times it clung to office. In addition, Canada West was becoming a difficult bed-fellow. The older race hatred was dying out and Brown's extreme religious propaganda only harmed himself; but he voiced a perfectly valid constitutional objection to the Act of Union when he pointed out that the identical representation of each division of the province was unjust to Canada West, which had now passed Canada East in population. His statement of the case was often fierce and tactless, but 'representation by population' was bound to gain supporters from its obvious logic and justice. On the other hand, Canada East now looked on the once hated Act of Union in the light of a treaty, a charter, a fundamental document. The fact that the attack on the Act came from Brown only served to consolidate the French-Canadians and to bring once more to the front those irritating features of racialism which are so disintegrating when challenged. Political parties practically became divided on sectional lines. A fortuitous combination of irreconcilable groups could defeat a ministry, which often returned to power, leaving the matter on which it was originally defeated an open question.

The situation might be summed up as fundamentally and incidentally impossible. First, an attempt was made to govern by a unitary system two distinct communities. A common legislature was called on not merely to act in matters where some general public opinion might be expected, but in details suitable to different races. Secondly, this attempt was made under a constitution which was politically unjust to the increasing economic development and population of Canada West. Thirdly, the stability which race, religion, language, traditions, and customs gave to Canada East irritated its neighbour; and, fourthly, any attempts to change the constitution were incidental forces which intensified the fundamental difficulties. In other words, when the inherent defects in the machinery were pointed out, such opposition was raised as made the hope of change far off and problematical. It is not surprising, then, that with fundamental weaknesses, grave incidental differences, and no great political party issues, government was reduced to an absurdity. Within ten years ten ministries held office. In three years four ministries were defeated and two general elections had provided no working majorities. The issue reduced itself to the very simple question of how it would be possible to carry on the government of the country. To follow in detail the history of these years would throw little light on the deadlock and the break-down of party government, but it is necessary to consider the various expedients brought forward, for out of them the solution finally came.

At times hopes were turned to an irresponsible executive and a written constitution such as those of the United States. The civil war served to kill ideas round which there had been much political grouping. 'Representation by population' appeared as early as 1850, and it was originally part of the tory programme. The liberal-conservative combination naturally succeeded in handing over the plank to the radicals, who divided the legislature on it year after year with increasing support from Canada West. John A. Macdonald opposed it on conservative and party principles, but the final decision lay with French Canada, and Cartier never deviated an iota from the letter of the Act. Brown's position, roughly stated, was that Canada West was ruled by French-Canadian votes, and that that was unjust. The weakness of his solution lay in the fact that, had representation by population been conceded, Canada East would have been ruled by Canada West. The vicious principle recurred—two peoples in a unitary system. John Sandfield Macdonald attempted to solve the problem by a definite adherence to the 'double majority' principle, which aimed at a working plan that no legislation should be passed affecting one division of the province which was not supported by a majority of members from that division. The idea was to develop further the bastard federal union, to which the ministries since 1841 bore actual witness. With different representation in the cabinet, hyphenated premierships, separate legal systems, and annual legislation applying only to one division, it seemed reasonable to J. S. Macdonald that the 'double majority' should be recognized and tried. Once in his career John A. Macdonald proposed that formal but extra-constitutional recognition should be given to the principle; but there was enough common sense left to prevent this motion being carried. The impossibility of dividing local issues and of the attempt to apply a federal method under a unitary system saved Canada from another ghastly experiment. J. S. Macdonald, however, formed a ministry ostensibly to make the attempt, and there is a certain grim humour in the circumstances which convinced this rather dour politician of his folly. His ministry only carried its separate school bill for Canada West by the votes of Canada East.

Tinkering with the constitution produced no results. When the steadier heads began to look objectively at the political situation, they saw that there were two sets of problems—those of a local and those of a general nature; that there were two races, French and British. No conceivable adjustment of the existing machinery would satisfy the conditions. Across the international line, a constitution was being tested which at any rate professed to be based on a formula suitable to Canadian conditions. The idea of federation came once more to the front. The growth and fruition of that idea at last brought political healing.

[AUTHORITIES.—The standard biographies are practically sources—Joseph Pope, Memoirs of the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald (2 vols., Ottawa, 1894); John Boyd, Sir George Étienne Cartier (Toronto, 1914); Alexander Mackenzie, The Life and Speeches of the Hon. George Brown (Toronto, 1882); O. D. Skelton, The Life and Times of Sir Alexander Tilloch Galt (Oxford, 1920). The pamphlet literature is full of contemporary criticism: Dunbar Ross, The Seat of Government of Canada . . . also the Composition and Functions of the Legislative Council and the 'Double Majority' Question (Quebec, 1856); Joseph Cauchon (?), Étude sur l'Union projetée des Provinces Britanniques de l'Amérique du Nord (Quebec, 1858); Isaac Buchanan, Letters illustrative of the Present Position of Politics in Canada (Hamilton, 1859); A. T. Galt, Canada 1849 to 1859 (Quebec, 2nd ed., 1860), are four of the most important. The Mirror of Parliament, the Journals of the Legislative Assembly of Canada, and the files of the Toronto Globe are essentials. J. C. Dent, The Last Forty Years, Canada since the Union of 1841, vol. ii (Toronto, n. d.), contains a good outline.]

CHAPTER XVIII

THE GROWTH OF THE FEDERATION IDEA

THE history of Canada contains many well-known suggestions for some form of union among the British North American colonies, but the co-operating circumstances which would have given them reality never took place, and they passed into the realms of unrealized and premature hopes. Deadlock and the failure of party government brought once more to the front the possibility of federation. It would be a mistake, however, to assign the final accomplishment to them alone, as Goldwin Smith has done. We have already seen forces working and conditions existing which made it impossible for the Canadas to live together under a legislative union. These made cabinet government exceedingly difficult, but they would inevitably have nullified any kind of free government. In a single state such as the Canadas it would have remained impossible so to balance the fundamental centripetal and centrifugal forces as to produce a reasonably effective administration. The breakdown of the machinery was merely the occasion which turned men's minds to the basic problems and made them realize the inherent sources of failure. In groping after stability and expansion many obstacles loomed up. Communications were primitive. The people of the Canadas knew little of one another and much less of the Maritime Provinces. There were social backgrounds peculiar to the different colonies round which local sentiment had gathered. There were institutions and laws, customs and traditions, to which each province had become attached. In addition, neither Great Britain nor British North America had decided what path colonial empire was to travel. A few statesmen had glimpses of a greater empire more solidly united than ever before ; but the vast majority seemed to have lost faith and were prepared for dissolution. For many years there can only be heard a few voices crying in the political wilderness. These utterances were generally received as academic and impracticable, and they rallied no forces to a movement. Even when J. W. Johnstone and Joseph Howe of Nova Scotia presented suggestions for federation to the imperial government there was little inclination to work out a scheme which was generally considered theoretical and at the best visionary. The greatest enthusiast would thus have found himself face to face with geographical, economic, and social obstacles, and, worse still, with political indifference. This last was the most serious, for it implied lack of faith and of all those intangible conditions which make for progress. It is remarkable that out of the stagnation in the Canadas should arise a prophet who, before federation seemed within the bounds of possibility, gave to British North American politics a Pisgah view of the promised land.

In the session of 1858 the various suggestions which were outlined at the conclusion of the last chapter were aired and discussed. Alexander Tilloch Galt brought forward resolutions of far-reaching import. The 'irreconcilable difficulties' demanded a federal union of Canada East and Canada West, which should be widened and strengthened by the inclusion of the North-western and Hudson's Bay territories and the Maritime Provinces. Such a union would be 'calculated to promote their several and united interests by preserving to each province the uncontrolled management of its peculiar institutions and of those internal affairs respecting which differences of opinion might arise with other members of the confederation, while it will increase that identity of feeling which pervades the possessions of the British crown in North America ; and by the adoption of a uniform policy for the development of the vast and varied resources of these immense territories will greatly add to their national power and consideration'.¹ Galt emphasized his plan as the real solution for Canadian difficulties. But he widened the outlook by pointing out the inspiration which his suggestion would afford to 'national strength and national prestige'. Galt, too, borrowed shafts from George Brown's quiver. Brown had become the enthusiastic preacher of the annexation of the North-west lands. Galt declared that Canada 'should assume the responsibility of occupying that great empire . . . such a thing had never occurred to any people as to have the offer of half a continent . . . the door should be opened to the young men of Canada to go into that country, otherwise the Americans would go there first . . . half a continent is ours if we do not keep on quarrelling about petty matters and lose sight of what interests us most'. The debates disclose pathetic narrowness. None of the prominent leaders, not even Brown, spoke during this discussion. Some thought the proposals interesting. Some desired federation as a step to independence, some opposed it on the same grounds. The lack of transportation was a barrier which might be surmounted, but that lay years ahead. Ignorance of the other colonies and lack of trade with them seemed to negative a larger union, and if it were accomplished Canadian money would only go to develop local works in the eastern provinces. The colonies needed no defence other than that provided by Great Britain. Possibly a federal union of the Canadas might be engineered. One member alone supported Galt whole-heartedly in his larger conception. The defeat of the ministry on questions arising in connexion with the capital prevented the resolutions from being put to the vote, but it is hardly possible to think that they would have been accepted. The short-lived Brown-Dorion ministry accomplished one thing. The governor-general decided to pass over the well-known leaders and to ask Galt to form a cabinet. A combination of circumstances convinced Galt that he could hardly hope to succeed, and he advised Sir Edmund Head to send for Cartier, and Galt entered the new government on condition that federation as he had outlined it should be made a government measure. It is doubtful how far Cartier and Macdonald were prepared to go. They saw, however, a way out of the problem created by the dispute over the capital. That issue could be shelved pending a consideration of a federal union, which was accordingly promised in the ministerial programme. If nothing else happened, the process of education was carried a stage farther. It was a singular triumph to have linked up the French-Canadian leader with the wider project. An immediate result followed. Cartier accompanied Galt and John Ross, the president of the council, on a mission to England.

¹ O. D. Skelton, op. cit., pp. 219 ff.

On their arrival they presented a memorial, drawn up by Galt, to Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, secretary of state for the colonies in Derby's conservative government.¹ Federation was urged not only as a cure for the distresses in Canada, but as a great constructive scheme. The Canadian ministers professed to feel that the time had arrived for a general constitutional discussion. The British North American colonies were like isolated and weak foreign states, a condition which was 'considered to be neither promotive of the physical prosperity of all, nor of that moral union which ought to be preserved in the presence of the powerful confederation of the United States'. The imperial government was requested to authorize a meeting of delegates from all the colonies and from the two divisions of Canada to consider a federal union and to discuss the principles on which it could be based. The memorialists firmly believed that the larger synthesis would create a great and strong country 'valuable in time of peace, and powerful in the event of war—for ever removing the fear that these colonies may ultimately serve to swell the power of another nation'. The memorial was covered with a confidential letter which outlined the framework of government.¹ The federal government was to consist of a governor-general, a senate elected on a territorial basis of representation, and an assembly elected on the basis of population, with a responsible executive. It should have control over customs, excise, and trade, the postal services, the militia, banking, currency, weights and measures, national public works, public lands and debts, criminal justice, unincorporated and Indian territories. For the moment it was left undecided whether these enumerated subjects should exhaust the federal power, or whether it should be further widened by the inclusion of other matters not specifically entrusted to the provincial legislatures. Suggestions were made for a federal court of appeal, for the allocation of the revenue from public lands to the province in which they were situated, and for financial support to each province from federal sources. Emphasis was specially laid on the fact that the new constitution would not be derived from the people, but from an imperial Act, and that the local legislatures would be granted nothing of sovereign power. Defects could thus be easily remedied, the forces of disunion weakened, and the provinces bound to the federal authority. The whole scheme aimed at creating a stronger union than that of the United States with 'so much of the federation principle as would join all the benefits of local government and legislation upon questions of provincial interest'. This letter was drafted by Galt, and, taken with his resolutions of 1858, is a singular anticipation of the future.

¹ O. D. Skelton, op. cit., pp. 239 ff.

Events in London seemed to point to success. The Canadian ministers lent support to a delegation from the Maritime Provinces who had come to urge a demand for imperial support to an intercolonial railway. Galt used the occasion to strengthen his constitutional proposals. He pointed out how clearly federation and transportation were bound together. Three million British subjects were isolated in the interior of America during the winter. Cut off from Great Britain and from the eastern colonies, except through a jealous foreign country, they were forced to depend on supplies from the United States. If the latter repealed its bonding laws, the whole commerce of the province would be dislocated. Trade, not policy, was the only safeguard against such an eventuality. Galt did not promise that Canada would use the railway if shorter and cheaper routes were available; but if war or political changes came, it would be an outlet and a security. Under any circumstances, it would assist federation 'to build up a nation worthy of England from her North American possessions'. The delegates got nothing more than courtesy. Financial assistance for the railway was definitely refused for the very good reason that there were more urgent claims at home.¹ The constitutional suggestions inspired no enthusiasm. Galt attempted to supply it by actually outlining a dispatch for Lytton to send to the governor-general. There was, however, too much indifference, if not actual hostility. Lytton avoided action through the lame excuse that Canada alone had made official overtures, and that it would be an act of discourtesy to propose a meeting of delegates until the other provinces had definitely assented to the federal principle. He forwarded dispatches to the other provinces outlining the actual state of the question. Nothing resulted from communications of such a cold and uninspiring nature.

¹ Ibid., pp. 242 ff.

Even in Canada the ministerial support weakened. With the larger scheme shelved, the cabinet bent its energies to get rid of the thorny problem of the provincial capital. The ratification of Ottawa as the seat of government gave them immense relief, and there was no consuming desire to open up difficult projects. Galt was forced to admit that they had little hope of success apart from strong support in the imperial cabinet. Although the Canadian ministry had adopted the idea as a ministerial measure, they did not feel called upon to resign. Brown saw behind the failure a definite lack of ministerial interest and sincerity. Cartier, however, carried a motion in the executive council that a full account of the proceedings and copies of the dispatches should be sent to the other provinces.¹ Publicists gave the federation idea a wider public. J. C. Taché foretold the constitutional and economic strength of the future dominion;² Alexander Morris looked ahead to a new nation 'with free institutions, with high civilization and entire freedom of speech and thought, and with its face to the south and its back to the north, with its right and left resting on the Atlantic and the Pacific, and with the telegraph and the iron-road connecting the two oceans';³ while D'Arcy McGee began to see visions of a British-American nationality.⁴

¹ Lytton to Head, December 24, 1858, State Papers, G. 158.

The great reform convention held at Toronto in 1859 rejected the general scheme as too remote for present Canadian difficulties and adopted a proposal for a kind of federal government for Canada. This proposal was brought before the legislature in 1860, only to be defeated.⁵ John A. Macdonald, however, gave an unequivocal support to a confederation of all the provinces. His mind was definitely fixed on a conception of the union which he never abandoned. The provinces were to be subordinate. He aimed to see 'a powerful central government, a powerful central legislature, and a powerful decentralized system of minor legislatures for local purposes'. His hope was framed in glowing words: 'We were standing on the very threshold of nations, and when admitted we should occupy no unimportant position among the nations of the world. Long might we remain connected with Great Britain. He hoped for ages, for ever,

¹ Journals of the Legislative Council, Canada (1858).

² J. C. Taché, Des Provinces de l'Amérique du Nord et d'une Union fédérale (Quebec, 1858).

³ Alexander Morris, The Hudson's Bay and Pacific Territories: a Lecture, pp. 56 ff. (Montreal, 1859).

⁴ D'Arcy McGee in the British American Magazine, August 1863, pp. 337 ff.

⁵ The Mirror of Parliament, No. 41, pp. 2 ff.; and cf. Alexander Mackenzie, op. cit., pp. 71 ff.

Canada might remain united with the mother country. But we were fast ceasing to be a dependency, and assuming the position of an ally of Great Britain. England would be the centre, surrounded and sustained by an alliance, not only with Canada, but Australia and all her other possessions, and there would thus be formed an immense confederation of free men, the greatest confederacy of civilized and intelligent men that ever had an existence on the face of the globe.' Thomas D'Arcy McGee began at the same time to give to the federation idea in the legislature the support of his brilliant tongue and his warm imagination. He looked forward to a day 'when we should be known not as Upper or Lower Canadians, Nova Scotians, or New Brunswickians, but as members of a nation designated as the Six United Provinces'.¹

Influences other than parliamentary and personal were at work. In both Canada and the United States there was taking place a change of opinion in respect to tariffs. Horace Greeley had aroused public opinion in favour of high protection. When war came this opinion gained strength owing to the absence from congress of free-traders from the Southern States. Indeed, the tariff of 1860 was passed when they had withdrawn on the eve of war. The civil war itself helped to confirm the changes, as the new expenditures demanded recourse to every available source of revenue. In Canada governments were looking for money to cover the improvident speed in public works, and the taxpayers had already begun to think of protection as a remedy for their financial ills. The fate of Elgin's reciprocity treaty was thus already in the balance some years before it actually expired after due notice from the United States. The interest, however, in connexion with federation lies in the fact that new markets might shortly be needed, and that Canadian financiers and economists began to link up economic with political unity and to think of the strength which would be afforded to material development and to the powers of negotiation if the British North American colonies could present a common policy. This influence towards union may appear small, but John A. Macdonald noticed it as an important cumulative force.¹

¹ Mirror of Parliament, No. 38, p. 3.

The civil war, however, provided a more subtle assistance to the political movement in the colonies. At first they shared with Great Britain a public opinion in favour of the North. This changed with almost lightning suddenness. British aristocratic and middle class sympathy turned to the South after the first failures of the Northern forces. The upper classes saw in the war a struggle between materialistic and arrogant democracy and refined conservatism. They welcomed the evidence that the latter could maintain traditional superiority in arms. Business men lost their heads in panic over the possibility of a cotton market curtailed by the victory of the high-tariff North. The government proclaimed a strict neutrality, but in doing so they appeared to recognize the Southern Confederacy as a belligerent nation. The majority of the newspapers grew Southern in their sympathies and patronizing in their comments. The anti-British sentiment, pent up since the revolutionary war, broke out with vehemence in the Northern States. Its most serious aspect was seen in the idea, to which Seward, Lincoln's secretary of state, lent weight, of promoting a war against a foreign state in the hope of nullifying the separatist tendencies of the South.² In Canada this was interpreted as a veiled threat, and public opinion turned against the North in sufficient strength to be remarkable. Some of the Northern papers were not slow to notice the change, putting it down to servile colonial imitation of the mother country, and holding out annexation as the just punishment. The Trent affair fell like a spark into this charged atmosphere. Palmerston and

¹ Parliamentary Debates on the Subject of the Confederation of the British North American Provinces, p. 32 (Quebec, 1865); Kennedy, op. cit., p. 604.

² Lord Charnwood, Abraham Lincoln, p. 211 (New York, 1917).

Earl Russell prepared for war. Northern emotionalism was ready to take up the challenge. In the British colonies the dread shadow fell across peoples who had no part in the diplomacy out of which the crisis had arisen. They saw their provinces the theatre of tragic events, their lands invaded by hostile armies, their citizens called to service in an imperial issue. Resolution there was and plenty of it, but it struggled with the knowledge that there was little defence ready and that there was no political machinery available to give to the unconnected provinces the efficiency so necessary for actual warfare and the emotional and unifying solidarity which was a condition of possible success. It was well that Lincoln, Seward, Lord Lyons, and the queen were not swept off their feet by Palmerston's arrogance, Russell's impetuosity, and the jingoes of both countries. The crisis passed, but it left behind bitter memories. It brought home, however, to an increasing number of British Americans their isolation and weakness. In Canada there was not sufficient force in politics to rise superior to party, and the militia bill was defeated. That episode need not be considered a reflection of public opinion, as succeeding governments did their utmost to cut their defence coat according to the financial cloth. The remarkable thing is that the events did not lend enough weight to the federation movement to give it an irresistible impetus. Canada prepared to try once again to make the badly assembled political engine work. Defeats, elections, ministries, followed one another with as traditional consistency as though no foreign foe had recently thundered at the unguarded gate.

In the Maritime Provinces and in Great Britain federation gained ground. The former felt more than ever their geographical and political insecurity. Nova Scotia once again declared for a maritime or general union, and the colonial secretary informed the lieutenant-governor that the imperial government was prepared to give any proposals favourable consideration.

Galt, who was in England at the time, reviewed recent events in Canada. In his public utterances there he once more emphasized the beneficial results of colonial union and drove home his arguments from the war scare. He realized that the rejection of the militia bill had produced a strong sentiment in England in favour of separation; but he advocated federation as an immediate policy, which, whether separation came at once or in the future, would enable the colonies 'to stand alone and resist further aggression'. British public opinion had grown tired of an empire which was prepared to cut off the mother country from colonial markets, and apparently ready to refuse aid to imperial foreign policy against the mighty. This strong separatist sentiment welcomed federation as a preliminary necessity to enable the mother country to get rid of the colonies and at the same time to render them sufficiently secure from becoming the prey of the United States. To the small but constructive group who had formed a new conception of empire, federation appeared more than ever desirable as the first step towards creating a new state within the imperial ties. Thus, from two different angles, British opinion united to lend support to colonial union.

The result might only have ended in a federation of the Maritime Provinces had not the Canadian constitutional stage-coach become so deeply embedded in political ruts, now beyond all repair, that its further progress was out of the question. No single group could move the chariot; and if all had been willing to push, the road ahead was just as bad. At this moment George Brown, who had done not a little to make political travelling impossible, bent his energies to a constructive policy. In 1864 he moved for a select committee of the legislature to consider a federal union on the basis of Galt's memorandum of 1858.¹ Just as the Taché-Macdonald ministry were getting ready for the rut, the committee reported on June 14 that there was sufficient unanimity to warrant them suggesting further consideration of the idea at the next session.¹ John A. Macdonald voted against the report for reasons which are not now clear. His opposition made little difference, if it was inspired by political motives, as the ministry was defeated on the same evening as the report was presented. While the lobbies were busy with the crisis and members were preparing once more to go through the farce of an election, Brown suggested to some friends of the defeated cabinet that advantage should be taken of the situation to settle for ever the constitutional difficulties between Canada East and Canada West, and he assured them that he was prepared to 'co-operate with the existing or any other administration that would deal with the question promptly and firmly, with a view to its final settlement'. It was evident that the dawn might break, and John Henry Pope and Alexander Morris, with Brown's permission, communicated this conversation to John A. Macdonald and to Galt.

¹ See above, p. 284.

The situation was delicate. Macdonald and Brown had been bitter political opponents for years, and their private life had known nothing of personal intercourse. The past was carried into the present. They met 'standing in the centre of the assembly room', so anxious was each to avoid the appearance of evil. Macdonald addressed his political and personal enemy and asked him if he had any objections to meet Galt and himself for a discussion. Brown replied laconically, 'Certainly not'. The Rubicon was crossed. On Friday, June 17, 1864, the three met at the St. Louis Hotel. Brown justified his course by the extreme urgency of the crisis and declared that only the hope of finally destroying the sectional differences could justify such a meeting. Macdonald and Galt accepted 'that footing', and stated that they represented the cabinet in asking Brown to assume office with them. Brown felt that such a union would be 'highly objectionable' and that 'the public mind would be shocked'. Macdonald insisted on the necessity of Brown's presence in the ministry which proposed a federal union of all the British American colonies as the solution of the sectional difficulties. Brown momentarily rejected the remedy as it had not been sufficiently considered, and harped back to representation by population in the Canadas. Macdonald and Galt pointed out the impossibility of accepting such a proposal, as no government could hope to carry it, and suggested a compromise 'in the adoption either of the federal principle for all British North American provinces, as the larger question, or for Canada alone, with provisions for the admission of the Maritime Provinces and the North-western Territories'. Brown stood out for the lesser federation first, and the conference adjourned, but agreed to report progress to the legislature, as hopes were not wanting of an ultimate understanding.

Galt, however, was unwilling that matters should be left in such an unsettled state, and the same evening he saw Brown alone and arranged an interview for the following morning, at which Taché and Cartier should be present. Macdonald, Galt, Brown, and Cartier (Taché was out of town) met the next day, and the following memorandum was drawn up for submission to Brown's supporters after approval by the governor-general and cabinet, and after Brown had interviewed the governor-general in private: "The government are prepared to state that, immediately after the prorogation, they will address themselves, in the most earnest manner, to the negotiation for a confederation of all the British North American provinces. That, failing a successful issue to such negotiations, they are prepared to pledge themselves to legislation during the next session of parliament for the purpose of remedying existing difficulties by introducing the federal principle for Canada alone, coupled with such provisions as will permit the Maritime Provinces and the North-western Territory to be hereafter incorporated into the Canadian system. That for the purpose of carrying on the negotiations and settling the details of the promised legislation, a royal commission shall be issued, composed of three members of the government and three members of the opposition, of whom Mr. Brown shall be one ; and the government pledge themselves to give all the influence of the administration to secure to the said commission the means of advancing the great object in view. That, subject to the house permitting the government to carry through the public business, no dissolution of parliament shall take place, but the administration will again meet the present house." Shortly after 6 p.m. the parties met at the same place, when Mr. Brown stated that, without communicating the contents of the confidential paper entrusted to him, he had seen a sufficient number of his friends to warrant him in expressing the belief that the bulk of his friends would, as a compromise, accept a measure for the federative union of Canada, with provision for the future admission of the Maritime colonies and the North-west Territory. To this it was replied that the administration could not consent to waive the larger question ; but, after considerable discussion, an amendment to the original proposal was agreed to in the following terms, subject to the approval on Monday of the cabinet and of his excellency : "The government are prepared to pledge themselves to bring in a measure next session for the purpose of removing existing difficulties by introducing the federal principle into Canada, coupled with such provisions as will permit the Maritime Provinces and the North-west Territory to be incorporated into the same system of government. And the government will seek, by sending representatives to the lower provinces and to England, to secure the assent of those interests which are beyond the control of our own legislation to such a measure as may enable all British North America to be united under a general legislature based upon the federal principle."

Difficulties next arose over the number of seats in the cabinet which the administration were prepared to yield. Brown asked for half, with the recent division in the assembly in his mind. Macdonald and his friends said this was impossible, but promised to consult their colleagues. Brown desired four offices for his supporters and wished himself to remain out. Macdonald promised to consult with him as to the conservative personnel of the Cabinet. It was a hard-fought fight. There would be only three liberals in a cabinet of twelve. Taché's work was finished, and Macdonald would be the real prime minister. The presidency of the council which Brown was offered was a place of little influence or importance. The big public to whom the Globe was only second to the bible lay outside ready to misconstrue, ready to condemn. Broken friendships lay ahead. The radical party would look hopelessly to the future, feeling that they had been betrayed. Brown made perhaps the greatest constructive decision in Canadian history, certainly in his career. He had seen the vision. He turned his back on the past. With no coward's bent head, but with forward look and with squared shoulders, he went out from his Ur of the Chaldees with faith, and knowing not whither he went.

[AUTHORITIES.—State Papers, [A], Series G. 292, 296, 298, 465 (Canadian Archives); Journals of the Legislative Council and Assembly of Canada. O. D. Skelton, Life and Times of Sir A. T. Galt (Oxford, 1920); J. Pope, Memorials of the Right Honourable Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. i (Ottawa, 1894); Alexander Mackenzie, The Life and Speeches of George Brown (Toronto, 1882), contain much valuable material. The pamphlet literature of importance includes J. Cauchon (?), Étude sur l'Union projetée des Provinces Britanniques de l'Amérique du Nord (Quebec, 1858); Alexander Morris, Nova Britannia: or British North America, its Extent and Future (Montreal, 1858); The Hudson's Bay and Pacific Territories (Montreal, 1859); A. T. Galt, Canada, 1849-59 (Quebec, 1860); C. B. Adderley, Letter to Rt. Hon. Benjamin Disraeli on the Present Relations of England with the Colonies (London, 1861); T. D. McGee, 'Plea for British American Nationality' (The British American Magazine, August 1863). C. D. Allin, The Genesis of the Confederation of Canada (Kingston, 1912), discusses the influence of the British American League in the federation movement.]

CHAPTER XIX

THE COMING OF FEDERATION

MACDONALD and Brown came together none too soon. The Maritime Provinces had seen the wider colonial synthesis grow more hopeless as the Canadas continued to cling to party warfare. Nova Scotia was specially irritated by the apparent lack of constitutional purpose and of constructive energy in relation to transportation, and determined to urge a union among the Maritime Provinces, which, if worked out, would restore in some respects the original historical union which had existed before New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island had been erected into separate governments. Before Brown took the great step forward, Charles Tupper, relying on the dispatch from the colonial office to which reference has been made,¹ moved a resolution in the assembly of Nova Scotia for a legislative maritime union to be worked out by delegates sitting in conference at Charlottetown. Tupper did not abandon hope of a British North America, which he had frequently urged in public, but he felt that the smaller union which he now proposed might give occasion to Canada to waken up from its apparent apathy. At any rate, internal and external events within recent years pointed to the necessity for local consolidation. There had been no dangerous and arresting difficulties in government, but separation disclosed weaknesses in the negotiating of policies with the imperial cabinet and in meeting the innuendoes of American politicians. Personal reasons, wholly praiseworthy and constructive, entered into the proposals. Many began to look for a wider sphere of political activity than that afforded by a sparsely populated province. Tupper succeeded in convincing Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island of the necessity for action, and a conference was called to meet at Charlottetown on September 1, 1864. In Canada the event was considered propitious, and at the request of his cabinet Lord Monck entered into communication with the lieutenant-governors of the Maritime Provinces and asked if a Canadian delegation might join the conference and lay before it the plans on which the coalition ministry had been formed in Canada. Permission was only too gladly given, and in due course eight Canadian ministers, including Macdonald, Brown, Cartier, and Galt, joined the conference.

¹ See above, p. 292.

The details of what took place are apparently lost, if ever they were committed to writing. But it is possible to piece together enough of the history to give the Charlottetown conference its due place in the developments. The Maritime delegates were unwilling that their own scheme should be discussed first, lest such a discussion should prejudice wider plans. Accordingly the Canadians were asked to open the general debate. While professing to favour the union of the Maritime Provinces as a step in a greater union, they were not unwilling to disclose their ideas and the consultations which had taken place in their cabinet since its formation. Galt dealt with the financial aspects of a general union. Brown outlined the organization, scope, and work of a federal legislature. Macdonald sketched the general framework of government. It would thus seem that many vital questions were opened up. The delegates from the Maritime Provinces then proceeded to the separate consideration of the proposals to which their respective legislatures had agreed. It was at once apparent that the local union could not hope for immediate success. New Brunswick was doubtful. Prince Edward Island refused to surrender its local government. Nova Scotia alone was prepared to support whole-heartedly the plan out of which the conference had arisen. Federation seemed to satisfy the conditions. The desire for strength, influence, and width would be satisfied with a central government, and local sentiment would not be outraged by the destruction of local institutions. On adjourning to Halifax, Macdonald was able to announce that the delegates were one in believing that a general federal union could be formed. Arrangements were made for delegates from all the colonies to assemble at Quebec during the following month to consider, and if possible to work out, a plan to the possibilities of which the Charlottetown conference had agreed. There were, however, vague indications of danger. Joseph Howe was unable, owing to his official duties as imperial commissioner for fisheries, to go to Charlottetown. He professed to give support to anything that might be agreed on.¹ When the Quebec conference had concluded its sittings he found on his return from Newfoundland that the actual foundations had been laid without him. His influence in his native province was so great that his absence from the negotiations might and did prove highly detrimental. In addition, Arthur Hamilton Gordon, lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, and Sir Richard Graves MacDonnell, lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, were not at all sympathetic. From these three sources future difficulties arose.

On October 10, 1864, there assembled at Quebec one of the most epoch-making conferences in history. It was an assembly of almost all the greatest British North Americans in public life—Taché, the aged French-Canadian premier; Cartier, who bore the olive branch of union to his countrymen; Galt, whose genius saved the proposal from wreck on the dangerous shoals of financial difficulties; Macdonald and Brown, who had shed party for the higher vision; Tupper and Tilley and others of less note, but of no less necessity at the moment. The Quebec conference saw the death with the autumn of 1864 of the visionless past, and by its constructive work it took a place among the great ventures of political faith. It is impossible to reconstruct those pregnant days without emotion. Outside, the most ghastly civil war in history was desolating a kindred race, and Sherman was on the move, leaving destruction and ruin in his wake. Inside, broken little provinces had toiled for a long colonial night and caught apparently nothing. Sectionalism was a recent sore. Party politics then as now were unstable. Jealousies, but recently shed, might easily be reassumed. Suspicion, publicly cast out, lay watching in the secret recesses of every heart. Every step forward meant a backward look to see how others viewed it. Upper Canada and Lower Canada composed a kind of armed neutrality. The Maritime Provinces were on guard lest they should sell their birthright for a mess of Canadian pottage. Historical darkness lies almost impenetrable over the scene. No official record has survived. Only a few notes kept by Lieut.-Col. Hewitt Bernard, the executive secretary, and A. A. Macdonald, a delegate from Prince Edward Island, have come down to us. At times the issue was ambiguous, at times doubtful, at times hopeless. Men's hearts almost failed them because of fears. It is only possible to imagine the heated discussions, the clash of interests, the balancings of hope and despair, when behind closed doors strong men tried to crush down passion with the hands of creative faith. Joy came at length in the morning. In less than eighteen days seventy-two resolutions were agreed on, which practically became the British North America Act of 1867, and the Quebec conference gave not only a constitution to the colonies but an example and an inspiration to states yet unborn within the empire. Canadian unity may not have behind it as prelude the military achievements of 'the embattled farmers' which gave to the world its first great federal system, nor the dramatic and brilliant faith which launched the union of South Africa. It has, however, a singular romance. There was, too, a stroke of genius in selecting Quebec as the place for the momentous conference. Where Montcalm and Wolfe fell as foes, Frenchman and Anglo-Saxon achieved a greater and more subtle victory.

¹ See Tupper to Howe, August 16, 1864, and Howe to Tupper, August 16, 1864, J. W. Longley, Joseph Howe, pp. 176 ff. (Toronto, 1904).

The available details need consideration. Taché, the Canadian prime minister, was elected chairman. Each division of the Canadas and each province had one vote. After a motion had been put to the vote, the representatives from any province could retire and discuss it among themselves privately. The conference allowed free discussion and sat as in committee of the whole. When resolutions had been passed in this committee, they were open to reconsideration and were carried as though the legislature were sitting with the speaker in the chair. Early in the proceedings J. A. Macdonald proposed and Tilley seconded a motion, which was carried unanimously, in which the principle of a federal union of British North America was accepted, provided it could be worked out 'on principles just to the several provinces'. Macdonald emphasized the difficulties in Canada, the isolation of all the colonies, and the general benefit resulting from union. He laid special stress on the necessity of avoiding the weaknesses which the civil war had disclosed in the constitution of the United States. There must be no reservation to the provinces of all powers not given to the federal government. A strong central government must be aimed at, to which all powers not specially conferred on the provinces should belong. The monarchical principle must be preserved and strengthened by an upper and lower house. In the former the federal plan would be preserved by giving provincial equality 'to three divisions—Upper Canada, Lower Canada, and the Maritime Provinces'. He expressed himself as open-minded on the method of appointing the senators, but for the moment he favoured nomination by the crown. Having committed the conference to general principles, it was possible to examine details.

The Canadian delegates were requested to prepare a series of resolutions based on the general expression of opinion at Charlottetown. These were drawn up, and after introduction by Macdonald were debated seriatim. The problems need not be examined closely, but there are several outstanding discussions which require special treatment. Firstly, Macdonald never for a moment abandoned his consistent support of a strong central government. When one of the delegates from New Brunswick pointed out that the proposal to specify the powers of the local legislature tended to create a legislative union, Macdonald accepted the challenge and insisted that any imitation of the United States in this connexion would end in disaster. Macdonald's wishes prevailed. Not only were federal and provincial powers enumerated, with an undefined residuum of powers left to the former, but the federal government was given power to appoint and to dismiss for due cause the provincial lieutenant-governors, and to disallow provincial Acts. The conference gave the scheme a strongly centralized bias. Indeed Brown would have been willing to have had a kind of local municipal administration which could not deal with political matters, and a local executive modelled on the American plan. The conference was evidently in general favour of making the federal government as powerful as possible and of controlling the provinces through federal safeguards. We shall consider in another chapter how this has worked out, but for the present it is only necessary to record the outline of the federal and provincial constitutions.

The financial terms and the scheme of representation in the central legislature gave rise to graver problems. Prince Edward Island had agreed to representation by population at Charlottetown, but when it found that it would only be given five members, with the adoption of sixty-five as a fixed number for Canada East, the delegates from the Island strongly objected. They also thought the financial proposals inadequate, and their dissatisfaction anticipated the future. None of the other provinces objected to the suggested scheme of making Canada East the pivotal province for representation, but the financial issues were exceedingly difficult. The Maritime Provinces had no municipal organization by which taxation for local works could be raised. They carried on all kinds of public activities through revenue raised by the central executive alone. For a period it seemed that no modus vivendi could be arrived at. Finally a proposal was carried that 'the finance ministers of the several provinces should meet, discuss the matter among themselves, and see if they could not agree upon something'. As a result, a scheme of provincial subsidies was accepted, based on a fixed grant 'per head of the population as established by the census of 1861'. The arrangement proved neither final as such, nor did it in the immediate issue resolve the doubts of the Maritime Provinces.

The organization of the senate was another issue almost equally destructive of agreement. There was the difficulty about the political complexion of the first senate. Brown feared that the liberals might not be given just treatment, and was only quieted when it was decided that the senators should be fairly representative of both parties. There does not seem to have been much division of opinion over the method of appointment. Macdonald and Brown were strongly against the elective principle. Brown's two liberal colleagues, Oliver Mowat and William McDougall, were in favour of it, but it was rejected by the conference without leaving any bitterness. There was a great deal of discussion over the division of membership. The Maritime Provinces were early considered a unit from this point of view, with Prince Edward Island dissenting, but they protested against making population the deciding factor in the number of members to be nominated. They pointed out that the only safeguard which the small provinces would possess was in the senate. Several divisions took place, and the final resolution was carried against the vote of Prince Edward Island.

When agreement on the seventy-two resolutions was finally reached, proposals were carried that the provincial governments should submit them to their legislatures at the next session. They were to be considered as a whole, rejected or accepted as a basic agreement. On the other hand, there is no record that the delegates desired them to be looked on as a kind of fundamental document. They constituted rather a working treaty, and the object was to prevent the necessity of further conferences. There was no evidence then, nor has any since emerged, which would warrant the conclusion that the Quebec conference thought that it had drawn up a sacrosanct instrument of government. The point is perhaps small, but it has had not unimportant bearings on constitutional interpretation.

With the close of the conference the scene shifts to the provincial legislatures, whose concurrence was necessary, and to England, which must provide enabling legislation. Brown went almost immediately to London to report progress and to see how the land lay. He wrote that the scheme had given 'prodigious satisfaction'.¹ Lord Monck forwarded the resolutions to the colonial office, and a dispatch of December 3 congratulated the conference on its results and expressed great satisfaction with the scheme. Minor objections were raised. The imperial cabinet did not approve of vesting the power of pardon in the provincial lieutenant-governors. There was also a fear lest with a senate nominated for life and with fixed numbers, it might prove difficult to restore harmony between the houses in the event of some serious difference arising without some special provision in the constitution.

The Canadian parliament opened on January 19, 1865, and on February 3 Macdonald introduced the seventy-two resolutions. His speech on the occasion was one of the ablest that he ever delivered. In singularly dispassionate terms he traced the past history, weighing carefully the remote and immediate causes which lay behind the federation idea, and linking them up with the imperial and foreign affairs which amplified and accentuated it. He gave the interpretation of the federal principle as he thought it applicable to British North America, stated frankly his preference for a legislative union, and pointed out how modifications had been accepted to make the central government strong and far-reaching. The constitution of the senate was defended as a following suitable to local conditions of British institutions. According to Macdonald the senate was intended to guard provincial rights. As for representation in the commons, he explained that Quebec was made the pivotal province because its population was most constant. The speech was tactful in the extreme and Macdonald had evidently weighed every word. Galt dealt with the financial proposals in careful detail, and moved from point to point with confident assurance. It remained for Cartier and for Brown to strike deeper notes. The former saw in the scene before him the creation of a 'new nationality'. His mind went back over the weak, broken provincial existence, and looked forward to a state in which differences of race, language, and religion would lose their disintegrating power before the sweep of a higher conception. He saw the French-Canadianism of his own province, the Anglo-Saxonism of the other provinces, take on a new colour—Canadianism. It is a remarkable fact that the first glimpse of this inner consequence should have come from a man who once had been in arms on a racial issue. Most interesting, because most human, was Brown's more sober enthusiasm. Perhaps his speech on this occasion discloses him at his best. For the moment, lifted beyond the bitterness of past years, with their harvest of venom, invective, and passion, Brown turned to the French-Canadian members and said: 'The scene presented by this chamber at this moment, I venture to affirm, has few parallels in history. One hundred years have passed away since these provinces became by conquest part of the British empire. I speak in no boastful spirit—I desire not for a moment to excite a painful thought—what was then the fortune of war of the brave French nation might have been ours on that well-fought field. I recall those olden times merely to mark the fact that here sit to-day the descendants of the victors and the vanquished in the fight of 1759, with all the differences of language, religion, civil law, and social habit nearly as distinctly marked as they were a century ago. Here we sit to-day seeking amicably to find a remedy for constitutional evils and injustice complained of—by the vanquished? No, sir, but complained of by the conquerors! Here sit the representatives of the British population claiming justice—only justice; and here sit representatives of the French population discussing in the French tongue whether we shall have it. One hundred years have passed away since the conquest of Quebec, but here sit the children of the victor and the vanquished, all avowing hearty attachment to the British crown—all earnestly deliberating how we shall best extend the blessings of British institutions, how a great people may be established on this continent in close and hearty connexion with Great Britain.’ It is interesting to note that Brown’s trust in federation as a link of empire ran through the debates strongly, if not unanimously, and served a purpose in educating British public opinion.

¹ Brown to Macdonald, December 22, 1864, Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. i, pp. 273 ff. (Ottawa, 1894).

All, however, was not plain sailing. The resolutions came in for searching criticism by astute and capable minds. Dorion, Dunkin, Holton, and John Sandfield Macdonald were opponents which any measure might fear. Nor was all the criticism purely political and purely futile. Not a little was inspired by insight. The financial terms, so bitterly attacked, soon proved unacceptable. Dunkin’s anticipation of difficulties in cabinet making has cost many a Canadian premier sleepless nights. Nor did the ‘ambiguities’ which he hunted up and down the resolutions prove mere imaginings. The courts have had more than their share of Canadian constitutional cases. Perhaps the most serious point of attack lay in the challenge that a virtual treaty had been made by those to whom no such commission had been entrusted and that the terms of federation had not been submitted to the people. The point led to much discussion then and since. The cabinet defended itself by stating that the matter had been under discussion at least since 1858, and that many by-elections in 1864 had returned candidates in favour of the scheme. No public meetings were widely organized against it, and no adverse petitions were presented. The government felt justified in assuming that the resolutions 'in principle met with the approbation of the country, and it would be obviously absurd to submit the complicated details of such a measure to the people'.¹ The legislative council and the assembly passed the resolutions by large majorities.²

In the midst of phenomenal success news, ominous and disturbing, came from the Maritime Provinces. The government of New Brunswick determined to appeal to the people before opening a discussion in the legislature. At the elections, they suffered defeat. Macdonald believed that they deserved it. 'The course of the New Brunswick government', he wrote, 'in dissolving their parliament and appealing to the people was unstatesmanlike and unsuccessful, as it deserved to be. Mr. Tilley should have called his parliament together, and, in accordance with the agreement of the conference at Quebec, submitted the scheme. Whatever might have been the result in the legislature, the subject would have been fairly discussed and its merits understood, and if he had been defeated, he then had an appeal to the people. As it was, the scheme was submitted without its being understood or appreciated and the inevitable consequences followed'.³ Only six supporters of federation were returned from forty-one constituencies. The effect on Nova Scotia was disastrous, and unfortunately it helped to accentuate a hostile state of mind there which continued to exist for a generation. There was already an undercurrent of suspicious dread abroad when Howe returned from Newfoundland to find the Quebec resolutions and Tilley's defeat subjects of animated discussion. It is unnecessary either to blame or to defend Howe's actions. He believed that Nova Scotia had been duped into an injurious scheme, and firm in that conviction he entered the lists as champion of the province. Tupper, however, was wise enough not to follow Tilley's example. He left the wider federation an open issue, and a motion was adopted in favour of the old plan for a legislative union of the Maritime Provinces. He defended his action in an astute letter to Macdonald. He had robbed the opposition of a resolution which they would have brought in, had the Quebec plan been introduced, and he had gained time not only for his own province to calm down but for Tilley to begin again.¹ The imperial government removed Lieutenant-Governor MacDonnell to Hong-Kong, and Gordon of New Brunswick visited England, where apparently he received instructions to give the movement help instead of opposition. In Prince Edward Island the legislature was practically unanimous in rejecting the larger federation, and the house of assembly memorialized the crown that the colony should not be joined to Canada or to any province.

¹ J. A. Macdonald to John Beattie, February 3, 1865, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, p. 21 (Oxford, 1921).

² The speeches here referred to are in Confederation Debates (Quebec, 1865).

³ Macdonald to J. H. Gray, March 24, 1865, Pope, op. cit., p. 23.

The disappointment in Canada was widespread. The Canadian government feared that the opposition might gain weight if action were not immediately taken. Parliament was hurriedly prorogued, and Macdonald, Cartier, Brown, and Galt left for England to discuss the speedy accomplishment of the British North America federation, the defences of Canada, reciprocity with the United States, the settlement of the North-west Territory and of Hudson's Bay Company's claims, and generally the critical state of affairs.¹ The imperial government assured them that every legitimate means would be used to procure the assent of the Maritime Provinces, that the promised guarantee for a loan towards an intercolonial railway still held good, that adequate care would be made for defence, for securing the North-west Territories, and for the renewal of the reciprocity treaty.² Early in July, Macdonald returned to Canada, and within a few weeks he was forced to face a political problem occasioned by the death of Taché. Monck immediately asked him to form a government, and in accepting the task he had Cartier's full support. Brown refused to serve under either Macdonald or Cartier, and a compromise was reached by which Sir Narcisse Belleau became prime minister. The session closed in the middle of September after having passed an important Act, which amplified and consolidated the Lower Canadian civil code. It was evident, however, that all was not well. Brown was working uneasily with a cabinet which Macdonald virtually controlled. He ostensibly resigned because he doubted the government's methods in connexion with the reciprocity treaty, but there can be little doubt that Brown felt his own position clearly.³ His two liberal colleagues, assisted by Fergusson Blair, who took Brown's place, honourably continued to carry out the coalition pact, but it was unfortunate that the liberal leader should have felt the necessity of withdrawing from the ministry at such an ambiguous moment.

¹ Tupper to Macdonald, April 9, 1865, ibid., pp. 25 ff. ; Tupper to Sir R. G. MacDonnell, May 10, 1865, Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. i, pp. 358 ff.

With the Maritime Provinces apparently hostile and with Brown no longer an active colleague, the outlook was sufficiently gloomy to inspire fear and to necessitate delay. In addition, economic negotiations with the United States and possible

¹ See the memorandum in Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. i, pp. 279 ff.

² Journals of the Legislative Assembly, Canada, Second Session, 1865, pp. 8 ff.

³ For Brown, see Pope, Memoirs of Sir J. Macdonald, App. IX and XI.

Fenian invasions were matters of urgent importance. In New Brunswick necessity assisted at the birth of hope. A. J. Smith's ministry had apparently no strong feelings against federation, although they had stepped into power largely on an anti-union agitation, and in other respects they were not united in policy. The colonial office tactfully but firmly urged federation on the province and used the Fenian scare to point to the defenceless state of the New Brunswick frontier. Public opinion began to veer and showed itself at by-elections. When the legislature opened, the lieutenant-governor's speech showed that he had changed his own position. Later he explained that the cabinet had privately agreed to his statements. The legislative council passed an address thanking him for his speech and asking him to obtain an imperial Act of union. Gordon unconstitutionally accepted the address without the intervention of his ministers and expressed his satisfaction at the sentiments which it contained. The ministry resigned as a matter of course. Smith might have put up a good fight had he kept his head and not allowed his tongue to get the better of his discretion.¹ A new ministry was formed and the legislature dissolved. At the elections the cause of federation swept the province, and the house of assembly at the close of June 1866 passed by an overwhelming majority a resolution authorizing the appointment of delegates to arrange 'with the imperial government for the union of British North America upon such terms as will secure the just rights and interests of New Brunswick, accompanied with provision for the immediate construction of the intercolonial railway'.² In Nova Scotia, Tupper was watching events with careful persistency. When changes were taking place in New Brunswick, the time for action came. William Miller, who had opposed the Quebec resolutions, made a speech in the middle of the cabinet crisis in New Brunswick, asking that the resolutions be considered as non-existent and that authority be given for delegates to consult with the imperial cabinet on a just and fair scheme of general union. Tupper saw his chance and put Miller's ideas in the form of a motion. The debate which followed was one of the most bitter in British American history, but Tupper's motion was finally carried by a substantial majority.¹

¹ For a careful account of the incident see Tilley to Macdonald, April 14, 1866, ibid., pp. 296 ff.

² Pope, Confederation Documents, p. 95 (Toronto, 1895).

Meanwhile in Canada Macdonald was waiting the turn of the tide, and the governor-general urged haste when Macdonald saw the need for tactics.² He refused to ask for the opening of parliament before the matter had taken on a different aspect in the Maritime Provinces. When it met he objected to any attempt to rush him off his feet. A delegation from Nova Scotia came to Ottawa to urge an immediate journey to England. Macdonald saw that there was vital work to be done before he could leave Canada. A change of ministry in England turned Monck into an advocate of delay, and the Maritime delegation went to London, where they spent four fruitless months. The Canadian parliament carried resolutions providing for the legislatures and governments of Upper and Lower Canada ;³ but Galt retired from the ministry owing to disagreement over the cabinet's educational policy for Lower Canada. Macdonald's long explanation of the events before the Canadian ministers sailed for England on November 7, 1866, discloses a masterly tactician at work. He did not want any delays in London. Monck must be there to guide the final arrangements, and it would have been fatal had discussions begun after the imperial parliament had risen. Macdonald felt that as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia had not accepted the Quebec resolutions there would necessarily arise new consultations, and he did not want any of them to 'reverberate through the British provinces' until the bill, finally settled just before the meeting of the British parliament, should be carried per saltum. On December 4 the delegates from Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick assembled in conference at the Westminster Palace Hotel in London in order to frame resolutions upon which an imperial Act might be built.

¹ Pope, Confederation Documents, p. 95 ; Journals of the Assembly, Nova Scotia, 1866, p. 70.

² For the history and correspondence, see Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. i, pp. 299 ff., 374 ff.

³ Pope, Confederation Documents, pp. 89 ff.

The conference was organized along the lines similar to those which had prevailed at Quebec, and on Christmas eve sixty-nine resolutions were agreed on, based on those of the Quebec conference, and forwarded to the colonial secretary. None of the debates were acrimonious. The delegates pledged themselves to a federal scheme in order to strengthen the imperial tie. There were signs of difficulties over the senate. It was feared that it might block legislation. Suggestions were made that the period of service should be limited and that appointment should be vested in the local legislatures. Some delegates dreaded the creation of an oligarchical second chamber, and proposed that the crown should be given power to appoint additional members in case of emergency. This fitted in with an earlier idea from the colonial office and was finally embodied in the imperial Act. Galt watched with anxious care the regulations connected with education. He was not satisfied with the resolution at Quebec which, in assigning education to the provinces, guarded the rights and privileges which the protestant and Roman catholic minorities in the Canadas might possess at federation. Lower Canadian protestants feared the future and wished to fence round and extend their school system. The Canadian government accordingly introduced a measure which aimed not only to confirm the rights of the minority in Lower Canada, but to set up a separate administrative machinery and to provide separate authority in secondary as well as in primary education. Suddenly a bill was brought in claiming similar privileges for the Roman catholic minority in Canada West. Opposition at once gathered. It was argued that the separate school law of 1863 had been thoroughly debated and had been accepted as a final measure for Canada West. So grave was the situation that Macdonald decided not to proceed with the legislation on behalf of Lower Canadian protestants.¹ Galt felt bound in honour as their champion to resign, but he did not blame Macdonald's course and willingly accompanied the delegation to London, where he drew up the resolution on education which finally became section ninety-three of the British North America Act. The subsidies to the provinces were increased. Provisions were made for the future inclusion of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, as these provinces had definitely withdrawn for the present from co-operation. The pardoning power of the lieutenant-governor was limited. The resolution in favour of the intercolonial railway was made more binding, and it was laid down that its construction was 'essential to the consolidation of the union of British North America and to the assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick'.

When the conference resumed after the holidays Lord Monck, the governor-general, and Lord Carnarvon, the colonial secretary, attended its meetings accompanied by Sir Frederic Rogers, afterwards Lord Blachford, the permanent under-secretary. Attempts were at once begun to draft a bill. With the final resolutions before them, at least six drafts were drawn up.² The seventh and last printed in imperial form was dated for revision February 9, 1867, and was the outcome of consultation between the imperial representatives and the members of the conference. Perhaps the most interesting fact about these drafts is that at first the name of the new federation was left to the decision of the queen. Later it appeared as 'the kingdom of Canada', and in the final draft as 'one dominion under the name of Canada'. Macdonald was 'the ruling genius' with power in 'management and adroitness'.¹ There can be little doubt with his strong bias in favour of a legislative union that he desired to form an auxiliary kingdom out of the colonies, and he deplored in later life the lack of insight which rejected the title.² He fought hard for its retention, but it was withdrawn at the instance of Lord Stanley, the minister for foreign affairs, who feared that it 'would wound the sensibilities of the Yankees'. It was appropriate that the name of Canada should be chosen in preference to the fantastic titles suggested by the press, but history does not relate from what source or for what reasons the word 'dominion' was added.³

¹ Skelton, op. cit., pp. 402 ff. ; Hodgins, Documentary History of Education in Upper Canada, vol. xix, p. 211.

² Pope, Memoirs of Sir J. Macdonald, pp. 123 ff.

No serious opposition met the bill in the imperial parliament. Lord Carnarvon in the lords ventured to see in the Act the creation of a great state, the crown of free institutions, which perhaps one day would overshadow the mother country. The bill passed practically as presented, and it can thus be considered the product of Canadian statesmanship. Indeed, no one seems to have cared much about it, and certainly there was no enthusiasm. Macdonald compared its progress to that of 'a private bill uniting two or three English parishes'.⁴ Galt deplored deeply the state of public opinion. He felt that

¹ G. E. Marindin, Letters of Frederic, Lord Blachford, pp. 301 ff. (London, 1896).

² Macdonald to Lord Knutsford, July 18, 1889, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, pp. 449 ff.

³ Many suggestions have been offered and need not be considered. It is possible, however, that the title 'dominion' had a colonial origin. In the fifth, or so-called 'third', draft of the bill—which was drawn up by the colonial delegates—the title was 'one united dominion under the name of the kingdom of Canada'. When the delegates and the imperial representatives came together to draw up or to agree on the final draft, Stanley's objections were doubtless mentioned. Some one sitting at the table may have drawn his pen through the words 'united' and 'of the kingdom'—J. A. Macdonald perhaps—and the final title 'one dominion under the name of Canada' automatically emerged.

⁴ Pope, Correspondence of Sir J. Macdonald, p. 451.

England was possessed ' with a servile fear of the United States ' and would prefer to abandon Canada rather than defend it against that country. Sentiment in favour of connexion had become very weak.¹ Sir Frederic Rogers merely looked on federation as a decent preparation for divorce, and Bright and Gladstone thought that the cession of Canada to the United States would not be too great a price for peace. It is true that the dominion of Canada which was created by proclamation on July 1, 1867, consisted of only four provinces, but a little vision might have seen that the clauses in the British North America Act allowing territorial extension were at least pregnant with magnificent possibilities. Be that as it may, the fact remains that Canada was born in a period of mid-victorian gloom.

With Galt depressed, Cartier blind to what was passing around him, the statesmen of the Maritime Provinces disappointed with the imperial attitude, it is not surprising that there was not much rejoicing in the dominion. Macdonald felt that his first duty was to the present, especially as Lord Monck, the new governor-general of Canada, had asked him to form the first federal ministry, and that was task enough, since the request made it clear that the duties of premier would fall on his single shoulders and that the old dual control had gone for ever.² There were obvious difficulties. Macdonald desired to continue the liberal-conservative coalition, but his very desire might embarrass his choice. In addition, Brown felt that the federation pact had done its work, and that he was now free to reorganize his party and to invite back into it those who had temporarily suspended their allegiance. At a great liberal convention held at Toronto on the eve of the first Dominion Day he rallied his followers. He declared that only the interests of his country could justify 'the degradation' of his having joined the coalition, and that it was the happiest day of his life when he got out of it. Howland and McDougall, the liberals who had remained with Macdonald, addressed the convention by invitation. The former pointed out that the liberalism of the dominion would be adequately represented in the new administration; while the latter, remembering doubtless Brown's championship of the territories and of an ocean-bounded British North America, emphasized the fact that federation was as yet only half accomplished, and that a strong party with this in view ought to combine in perfecting the work begun under Brown's auspices. It was clear that the old divisions were in some respects to disappear even though Brown would be in opposition.

¹ Galt to his wife, January 14, 1867, Skelton, op. cit., pp. 410 ff.

² ' I desire to express my strong opinion that, in future, it shall be distinctly understood that the position of first minister shall be held by one person, who shall be responsible to the governor-general for the appointment of the other ministers, and that the system of dual first ministers, which has hitherto prevailed, shall be put an end to ': Monck to Macdonald, May 24, 1867, Pope, Correspondence of Sir J. Macdonald, p. 46.

Other difficulties, which Dunkin had foreseen, at once presented themselves.¹ There were many interests which would claim representation in the cabinet, and in recognizing these Macdonald created a precedent, which will be dealt with later, destined to become gradually almost a constitutional convention.² Firstly, Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritime Provinces would require territorial recognition. Secondly, the French-Canadians never doubted the special claims of their race. Thirdly, the Irish Roman Catholics looked on themselves as strong enough to deserve a cabinet minister. Fourthly, the English minority in Quebec felt that they had peculiar claims for similar representation. Thus, the federal idea and creed and race were early to the front in the completion of a federal cabinet. The partial shedding of the older political affiliations also complicated Macdonald's choice. The French-Canadians were early promised three portfolios in a cabinet of thirteen. Galt came in to satisfy the English of Quebec. Ontario was given five members and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick received two each. When the cabinet was finally announced, the absence of the names of Tupper and D'Arcy McGee disclosed Macdonald's difficulties. Cartier insisted on three French-Canadians. If McGee, who sat as an Irish Roman catholic for a Quebec constituency, had been admitted, the Quebec representatives with Galt would have numbered five. Howland and McDougall, knowing the old liberal watchwords, claimed that Ontario should have one more member than Quebec. Had Macdonald desired to satisfy these claims and to stick to Galt and McGee, it would have meant that Ontario and Quebec would have eleven members, and that, if the other provinces were proportionately represented, the cabinet would have been larger than he desired. The outlook seemed so difficult that Macdonald almost lost heart and determined to advise Lord Monck to send for Brown. Tupper, in this dilemma, at once came forward and placed his office at Macdonald's disposal. McGee, with his generous enthusiasm, followed Tupper, and Edward Kenny came in as an Irish Roman catholic and the second representative from Nova Scotia.¹

¹ Confederation Debates (Quebec, 1865), p. 497.

² See below, pp. 381, 413-14.

The first general elections for the dominion were held in August and September. In Ontario, Quebec, and New Brunswick the government was overwhelmingly supported and Brown lost his seat in South Ontario. In Nova Scotia there was another tale to tell. Tupper alone of nineteen government candidates was returned. There was a certain amount of consolation in the fact that he defeated William Annand, Howe's right-hand man, and afterwards the chief promoter of repeal in the province; but Macdonald feared that 'that pestilent fellow Howe' might give some trouble in England, and he at once bent his energies to frustrate him. A bill for the intercolonial railway was at once put through parliament as an immediate evidence of the government's intentions not only to carry out the letter of the British North America Act, but of its desire to give Nova Scotia as little cause for complaint as possible. The province, however, seemed bent on a separatist course. The provincial elections were a sweeping defeat for federation. The legislature passed an address in favour of a repeal of the union, and a delegation headed by Howe was sent to London to lay the address before the crown and to explain the sentiments and feelings which lay behind it. The dominion government sent Tupper to London to oppose the Nova Scotians. His presence, from that point of view, was hardly necessary. The imperial cabinet had no intentions, as far as they were concerned, of allowing Nova Scotia to destroy a plan so long in progress and so recently matured. On the other hand, Tupper had an interview with Howe, in which he pointed out that if he insisted in antagonizing the imperial and dominion governments he would hurt not only himself and his party but the province to which he was devoted. Defeated in England, Howe returned in a doubtful state of mind. In a conversation with Tilley he left the impression that concessions might be arranged. Tilley reported to Macdonald that a convention of anti-federalists was shortly to assemble in Halifax and that Howe thought that a visit from Macdonald would do good. This invitation was supported by Tupper, who followed the prime minister from Ottawa to Toronto to press it home. Accordingly Macdonald, Cartier, McDougall, and John Sandfield Macdonald at once proceeded to Halifax.

¹ Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. i, pp. 329 ff.

Howe was sobering. He found that the anti-union movement was getting out of hand, that there was a possibility that the law might be resisted, and that the idea of annexation to the United States might gain ground. Macdonald informed him that Canada had no objections to consider 'better terms', and that Nova Scotia would be perfectly justified in agitating for changes, but that the principles of the Act were inviolate. He invited Howe to join the ministry to strengthen constitutional reform if his province desired it, and at any rate to prevent it being hurt through lack of due support at Ottawa. Howe hesitated. The emotions of the people were at the moment too much out of hand to allow such a course. Finally Macdonald and Cartier addressed the convention, where they practically repeated their advice to Howe. The immediate result was a resolution against extremes and a pledge to use constitutional means for repeal, and a promise that the local legislature would carry on the provincial business. Macdonald distinguished between the members of the assembly and those of the house of commons. The former were evidently extremists, and some of the local cabinet were at least disloyal in words, but the latter did not seem entirely wedded to repeal and would 'come round by degrees'. Macdonald did not let the grass grow under his feet. He carried on for four months a long correspondence with Howe, retold him the hurt which Nova Scotia must suffer, and drove home the dangers which lay in the growing disaffection. The Canadian finance minister opened up the plan for 'better terms'. Finally these were agreed to, and Joseph Howe entered the dominion ministry on January 30, 1869, as president of the council.

[AUTHORITIES.—The main sources are: John Boyd, Sir George Étienne Cartier (Toronto, 1914); Joseph Pope, Confederation Documents (Toronto, 1895); Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald (2 vols., Ottawa, 1894); Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald (Oxford, 1921); O. D. Skelton, Life and Times of Sir A. T. Galt (Oxford, 1921); Alexander Mackenzie, Life and Speeches of the Hon. George Brown (Toronto, 1882); Parliamentary Debates on the Subject of the Confederation of the British North American Provinces (Quebec, 1865); A. G. Doughty, 'Notes on the Quebec Conference, 1864' (Canadian Historical Review, March 1920); J. H. Chisholm, The Speeches and Public Letters of Joseph Howe (2 vols., Halifax, 1909). Among the pamphlet literature the following are most important: A. T. Galt, Speech on the Proposed Union of the British North American Provinces delivered at Sherbrooke, C.E. (Montreal, 1864); T. D'Arcy McGee, Two Speeches on the Union of the Provinces (Quebec, 1865); Joseph Howe, Confederation considered in relation to the Interests of the Empire (London, 1866); Charles Tupper, A Letter to the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Carnarvon (London, 1866); William Annand, A Letter to the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Carnarvon (London, 1866); E. G. Penny,

The Proposed British North American Confederation: Why it should not be imposed on the Colonies by Imperial Legislation (Montreal, 1867); Proceedings of the Reform Convention at Toronto, June 1867 (Toronto, 1867). The files of the Toronto and Halifax newspapers, especially the Globe and the Chronicle, are useful. J. H. Gray, Confederation: the Political and Parliamentary History of Canada from 1864 to 1871 (Toronto, 1872), Sir Charles Tupper, Recollections of Sixty Years in Canada (London, 1914), Sir Richard Cartwright, Memories of Confederation (Ottawa, The Canadian Club, 1906), Reminiscences (Toronto, 1912), do not add materially to the history, but they supply many personal touches and afford interesting sidelights. The best general introduction is A. H. U. Colquhoun, The Fathers of Confederation (Toronto, 1916). Dr. Colquhoun's little book is based on a thorough knowledge of the material and is written with judicial insight. L. J. Burpee, 'Joseph Howe and the Anti-Confederation League' (Transactions of the Royal Society of Canada, 3rd series, vol. x, sect. ii, pp. 409 ff.), contains valuable material. T. C. Blegen, 'A Plan for the Union of British North America and the United States, 1866' (Mississippi Valley Historical Review, March 1918, pp. 470 ff.), discusses a bill introduced into the house of representatives for the union of British North America and the United States, and incidentally throws light on some of the forces at work during the completion of Canadian federation. The British Parliamentary Papers include: Correspondence respecting the proposed Union of the British North American Provinces, December 1864-January 1867 (London, 1867); Letter opposing Confederation addressed to Lord Carnarvon . . . by Howe, Annand, and McDonald, with an Appendix of Documents (London, 1867); Representations of Nova Scotia against inclusion in the Dominion (London, 1867-8). Consult also Correspondence and Negotiations connected with the Affairs of Nova Scotia (Ottawa, 1869).]

CHAPTER XX

THE DOMINION OF CANADA

THE federation of 1867, great though it was in actual accomplishment, was greater in its possibilities. The original dominion comprised only four provinces, but the faith which hoped for a Canada extending from ocean to ocean did not die. In the constitution itself it found expression in a clause which contemplated the inclusion of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Rupert's Land, and the North-western Territory. Canadian statesmen for many years were inspired by this magnificent prospect, which runs through the federation debates, and they believed that the consolidation of British North America was a first charge on their political abilities. Such a future, if realized, meant that there would inevitably grow up the national consciousness of a distinct group which would either gradually seek independence as a sovereign state in international law, or would create within the empire changes in colonial status and in the imperial relationship. There remain to be considered, firstly, the territorial expansion of Canada ; secondly, with that accomplished and with the imperial tie still binding, the extension of Canadian autonomy to which the former gave force and the latter provided delicate problems ; and thirdly, the constitutional place which Canada at present holds under the British crown.

Beyond the stories told by a few adventurers and traders, New France for generations knew little of the great western lands. For years a few posts were all that bore witness to the dreams of Cartier, Champlain, and La Salle, who looked for a north-west passage to the Indies and saw in imagination a western highway to the riches of the east. It was only during the last decades of the French régime that Pierre de la Vérendrye and his sons discovered and explored much of the central prairies. Their chain of posts aimed not only at trade, but at confining the English to the districts round Hudson's Bay so that the north-west might be added to the dominions of Louis XV. With the necessity of guarding the original and settled territory from Indian attacks which might come at any moment, and from the more subtle and less concrete aggression of British diplomacy, the vision gradually faded, until New France became a small oasis of civilized life in a vast undeveloped northern continent. Half a century later Alexander Mackenzie crossed the mountains to the Pacific, and on the cliffs of the western ocean he inscribed the date July 22, 1793, and the prophetic words 'from Canada by land'. For years the importance of these voyages remained unappreciated, and the rival traders of the Hudson's Bay Company, the North-west Company, and the X. Y. Company were the only white men inhabiting the regions. In 1801 Mackenzie published an account of his voyages which gave Lord Selkirk the idea of settling on the fertile prairies a group of distressed Scottish crofters. He obtained a large grant from the Hudson's Bay Company which included the valleys of the Assiniboine and Red River. The district was named Assiniboia, and a settlement was begun in 1811. The jealousies of the North-west Company practically wrecked the colony, which dragged out a stagnant existence, supplemented by French-Canadians, half-breeds, and a few Americans.

The jealousies of the various companies were finally laid to rest in 1821, but not before the rivalry had driven their traders farther and farther west until they reached the ocean. Until the Washington Treaty of 1846, which settled the frontier, they alone were in possession, and their presence there probably served to preserve for the empire the future colony of British Columbia. Canada had thus a sufficient historical connexion with the west to make it seem a rightful heritage round which, as we have seen, emotion and policy had begun to gather. When a select committee of the imperial parliament was appointed in 1857 to consider the monopoly claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company, the legislative assembly of Canada boldly claimed the Pacific ocean as its just and rightful boundary. Two years later a group of Canadians founded a newspaper at Fort Garry for the purpose of attacking the company's claims and of carrying on a propaganda in favour of the annexation of the North-west to Canada. The British government were willing to further the idea, at least in connexion with the districts on the Red River and the Saskatchewan, but they laid down as conditions of occupation that Canada should open up communications and provide for local administration. If practical Canadian interest was not forthcoming the committee suggested the creation of some kind of authority, possibly that of a crown colony. Nothing came of either plan, but enthusiasts such as George Brown and Alexander Morris never ceased to point out the path to a clear-purposed goal. On the eve of federation, John A. Macdonald began to grasp the situation. 'If Canada', he wrote, 'is to remain a country separate from the United States, it is of great importance to her that they (the United States) should not get behind us by right or by force, and intercept the route to the Pacific.' He looked, however, on the acquisition of the west merely as a necessity in establishing a future highway to the Pacific, and he feared the possession of too much unoccupied lands lest 'the youth and strength of the country' should be drained.¹

No sooner had the federation got under way than Macdonald's conception expanded. He began to see wider possibilities than those implied in a barren passage for steel rails. Early in the first parliament of the dominion he arranged for a debate on

¹ Macdonald to E. W. Watkin, March 27, 1865, Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. ii, p. 43.

'the Hudson's Bay question'.¹ In December 1867 William McDougall introduced a series of resolutions, on which an address was founded praying the crown to unite with Canada Rupert's Land and the North-western Territory. Macdonald sought 'a broad country for the expansion of our adventurous youth'. The demand for annexation, he declared, was not only sentimental but practical. The country could only remain British by being included in the federation scheme, and Canada needed it to round off its territory and as an 'outlet for its adolescent population'. Before anything could be done it was necessary to arrive at some plan by which the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company over Rupert's Land might be acquired. The imperial law officers were convinced that these rights were beyond dispute, and until they were transferred to Canada the latter had no desire to possess the North-western Territory, separated as it would be from the dominion by lands in the possession of the Company. The colonial office also pointed out that an imperial Act was necessary to legalize any arrangement between the company and Canada for the transfer of Rupert's Land. An imperial Act was passed in July 1868 by which the crown was empowered to accept the surrender of 'all rights of government and proprietary rights and all other privileges, franchises, powers, and authorities', and to declare Rupert's Land by order in council a part of the dominion of Canada; and the parliament of Canada was given authority 'to make, ordain, and establish within the land and territory so admitted, all such laws, institutions, and ordinances, and to constitute such courts and offices as might be necessary for the peace, order, and good government of her majesty's subjects and others therein'.²

In the following October Cartier and McDougall were sent to England to hasten negotiations. Cartier urged Lord Granville, the colonial secretary—‘pussy Granville’ of ‘bland, soft manners’—to help in completing ‘the whole work of confederation’. Granville acted with great tact. He kept the Canadians in one room and ‘the H. B. people in another’ until he arranged a settlement.¹ For the sum of £300,000 the company surrendered their interests to the crown, with the reservation of one-twentieth of the fertile belt ‘bounded on the south by the United States boundary, on the west by the Rocky Mountains, on the north by the northern branch of the Saskatchewan River, on the east by Lake Winnipeg, the Lake of the Woods and the waters connecting them’. In addition to this reservation the company also received forty-five thousand acres adjacent to each trading post. The Canadian parliament by address accepted on June 1, 1869, the arrangements arrived at by Cartier and McDougall, and the crown was asked to unite Rupert’s Land to Canada on the terms therein set forth and also to unite the North-western Territory on the terms of the previous address.² An understanding was reached for the formal transfer on December 1, 1869. In anticipation, the dominion parliament passed on June 22, 1869, ‘an Act for the temporary government of Rupert’s Land and the North-western Territory when united with Canada’. This Act was a preliminary step in taking over the districts from the local authorities. The name ‘North-west Territories’ was given to the entire country, and provision was made for the appointment of a lieutenant-governor who should administer justice and establish laws, institutions, and ordinances subject to their ratification by parliament. He was to be guided by instructions issued from time to time under order in council, and was to be assisted in administration by a council. Until further provisions were made, existing regulations were to remain in force and public officials were to continue in office. Under this Act McDougall was appointed lieutenant-governor, and he left on September 28 to take up his duties.

¹ Macdonald to Charles Bischoff, October 17, 1867, ibid., p. 3 n.

² 31 & 32 Victoria, c. 105 (Rupert's Land Act, 1868). The commercial and trading rights in Rupert's Land and elsewhere were preserved to the company.

¹ Cartier to Macdonald, February and March 6, 1869, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, p. 91.

² House of Commons Journals (1869), pp. 169 ff.

It is hardly necessary to retell the story of the Red River rebellion except in so far as it affected the territorial organization. The half-breeds of the district were led to believe that the transfer of the country might place in jeopardy their claims to lands, and this discontent was further increased when the French Roman catholics began to fear that their linguistic and religious rights or privileges were in danger. A Canadian surveying party in the summer of 1869 did not attempt to dispel these ominous suspicions or to act with discretion and tact. The settlement determined to resist, and a provisional government was set up under Louis Riel. Circumstances combined to create difficulties. The company had given the government no indication of the state of mind which existed. Their governor, McTavish, was seriously ill, and—more unfortunate still—the Roman catholic bishop, Taché, was absent in Rome. McDougall did not move with either caution or insight. His initial instructions ordered him to proceed to Fort Garry, and, ‘on hearing of the transfer of the country to Canada’, to make ‘all preliminary arrangements for the organization of the government’.¹ When he reported the opposition, he was ordered to act with the greatest care, as he was in reality in a foreign country still under the government of the company. Macdonald advised him to ascertain who were the two leading half-breeds and to include them in his council. When McDougall wrote of being sworn in and of undertaking the government as soon as official notice reached him of the transfer, Macdonald again warned him against such a course unless he saw the way clear to its effective performance. That he would be obeyed was only an assumption, and if his authority was rejected the dominion would be rendered ridiculous to the settlers and to the people of the United States, and an excuse would be given to the inhabitants to form, ex necessitate, a government of their own.

¹ Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. ii, p. 52.

In cable communication with the colonial office, the Canadian cabinet absolutely declined to accept the transfer while the district remained in such a distracted and rebellious state. A special minute of council was drawn up on December 16, 1869, which placed on record the matured judgement of the executive. A hasty assumption of rule by Canada would probably end in bloodshed, and thus the future sentiment and attitude of the people would be prejudiced. The Indians and the restless Americans would be irresistibly tempted to join the insurgents. The transfer must be delayed to prevent war. Even were the purchase money paid, it would be unstatesmanlike to end the only constituted authority in the country and forcibly to replace it by another. The dispatches to McDougall may have been delayed, but he assumed that the transfer had taken place, and neglecting his initial instructions he issued a proclamation on December 1, and attempted to assume the administration by a coup de main. Macdonald's fears were realized. The lieutenant-governor's position at Pembina became precarious. He was forced to retreat to St. Paul. Canada was humiliated, and the hopes and pretensions of the insurgents increased.¹ Worse still, the work of a special mission which hoped to arrive at Christmas was rendered hopeless from the start. Riel set up a dictatorship, imprisoned the mission, and was responsible for a cruel and cold-blooded murder. Finally it became necessary to take serious action, and a force of imperial regulars and Canadians advanced on Fort Garry, which was reached in August 1870. Riel and his followers fled before a shot was fired.

On May 2, 1870, Macdonald introduced a bill into the Canadian parliament constituting the old district of Assiniboia a new province of the dominion under the name of Manitoba.¹ This Act, which was confirmed by an imperial Act granting general power to the dominion to create new provinces and to legislate for the territories,² established Manitoba on lines analogous to the other provinces, but included special provisions in connexion with education, and for quieting existing titles.³ The name North-west Territories was given to the portion of Rupert's Land and the North-western Territory not included in Manitoba; and the Act of June 1869, which, as has been pointed out, was passed for the whole territory, was re-enacted temporarily for the new and limited North-west Territories, with the proviso that the lieutenant-governor of Manitoba should also become lieutenant-governor of the North-west Territories. On May 3 orders were issued for paying over the purchase money to the Hudson's Bay Company. On May 20 A. G. Archibald was appointed first lieutenant-governor of Manitoba. On June 23, under the authority of the 'Rupert's Land Act',⁴ an imperial order in council was issued which formally transferred Rupert's Lands and the North-western Territories to Canada and gave the dominion full power to legislate for their welfare and good government. In addressing the late council of Assiniboia, the new lieutenant-governor outlined the future: 'Now that the province has been incorporated with the dominion it will partake of the prosperity of the older communities. Politically joined to the other provinces, new routes of communication will soon be opened up. The telegraph system, extended to this place as it shortly will be, will give you hourly communication with Canada and Europe. The highway and the telegraph will

¹ Macdonald to Rose, December 31, 1869, Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. ii, pp. 59 ff.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 689 ff. (33 Victoria, c. 3).

² Ibid., p. 694, The British North America Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Victoria, c. 28).

³ For the education disputes in Manitoba see Willison, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal Party, vol. ii, pp. 201 ff. (Toronto, 1903); Skelton, Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, vol. i, pp. 439 ff.; vol. ii, pp. 13 ff.

⁴ See above, p. 325.

remove the isolation in which you have been hitherto kept by the boundless prairies of the south and the impassable swamps and lakes of the east, and make you part and parcel of the living and moving world.'¹

The government of the North-west Territories was provisional, and they achieved separate political existence under a dominion Act of April 8, 1875, which substituted election for nomination in the selection of part of the council. When David Laird was appointed lieutenant-governor on October 7, 1876, a new era began which saw the foundation of educational and municipal systems, the suppression of a half-breed rebellion, and the establishment of a judiciary. In 1886 representation in the dominion parliament was conceded. In 1888 an elected legislative assembly took the place of the legislative council. The judges were allowed to sit in it as expert but non-voting members. In 1897 the executive was made responsible. In the following years a quasi-provincial constitution took form with a lieutenant-governor, an executive appointed from an assembly of thirty-one members elected on manhood suffrage, and authority to legislate on many local matters. In 1905 two new provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, were created, without, however, the control of their crown lands.²

With the creation of these two provinces there remain the Yukon and portions of the North-west Territories. The commissioner of the North-west Territories is assisted by a council not exceeding four in number appointed by the dominion government. The powers of the commissioner in council to make ordinances are defined under dominion legislation of 1906.³ The laws of Canada, unless otherwise specified, are applicable to the Territories, but the governor-general in council possesses special power in relation to intoxicants, arms and ammunition, and judicial affairs, and may apply acts not otherwise in force. In 1898 the Yukon was created a separate Territory by Act of parliament, and till 1908 government was vested in a commissioner and a legislative council partly elected and partly nominated by the governor-general under his privy seal.¹ In the latter year a council was organized consisting of ten members—two from each of five electoral districts—elected on a manhood suffrage basis.² Every council continues for three years unless previously dissolved by the commissioner, and must assemble at least once every year. The commissioner constitutes the executive government and is under instructions from the governor in council or the minister of the interior. The commissioner in council can legislate on subjects defined by dominion legislation, and on education.³ Every ordinance, however, dealing with education must provide that the majority of taxpayers in any district may create such schools and levy such school taxes as they think expedient, and that the minority may establish separate schools and assign their school rates to them alone. Responsible government does not exist, but since 1908 the commissioner is expected to carry out as far as possible the wishes of the legislative council. The Yukon has returned a member to the dominion parliament since 1902.⁴ The regulations governing the laws of Canada in relation to the North-west Territories are applicable to the Yukon.

¹ Archibald to late council of Assiniboia, Fort Garry, September 6, 1870, E. H. Oliver, The Canadian North-west: its Early Development and Legislative Records, vol. i, p. 623 (2 vols., Ottawa, 1914).

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 700 ff.

³ Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, c. 62.

When the Oregon boundary dispute between Great Britain and the United States was settled in 1846, there remained in the possession of the former Vancouver Island and the territory afterwards known as British Columbia. In 1849 Vancouver Island was granted to the Hudson's Bay Company for ten years

¹ 61 Victoria, c. 6, amended by 62 & 63 Victoria, c. 11.

² 7 & 8 Edward VII, c. 76.

³ Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, c. 63 ; Yukon Ordinance, No. 27, 1902.

⁴ 2 Edward VII, c. 37.

upon terms which implied colonization. A governor was appointed to administer the colony with a nominated council of not more than seven members, but powers were granted to him to call an assembly. When the new governor, Richard Blanshard, arrived from England, he found that the company was supreme, and after remaining a few months he retired in disgust. James Douglas, the chief factor, took his place, and with a servant of the company in control there was no advance in settlement, as the company did not want to encourage colonization at the expense of their own rich fur trade. Provision had been made for the revocation of the grant if at the end of five years successful settlement had not been carried out. A petition in 1853 from the few hundred white men on the island for the enforcement of this provision was overruled owing to the company's influence in London, but Douglas was instructed to call an assembly. The Island was divided into four electoral districts returning seven members. The franchise was fixed at ownership of twenty acres and the qualifications for membership were based on the possession of fairly high freehold property. The first legislature met in August 1856, with a legislative council of three and a house of assembly, both composed of officials and servants of the company.

The mainland remained practically a hunting preserve leased to the same company, until, with the discovery of gold on the Fraser River in 1856, a stream of immigration began, and it became necessary to erect some sort of local administration. In 1858 Douglas severed his connexion with the company, and in November of that year he was appointed lieutenant-governor. Under the name of British Columbia the continental territories west of the Rockies began political life as a crown colony.¹ The colonial secretary instructed the governor to seek the goodwill and confidence of the immigrants, to show no preference to British settlers at the expense of Americans or other foreigners, and to remember that the colony was destined at the earliest convenient moment for a house of assembly. As soon as there was a permanent population, however small, free institutions must be set up. Governor Douglas justified the confidence which was placed in him, and his rule was characterized by wisdom and impartiality. With the influx of English settlers it was inevitable that the demand for popular government should arise, and it was unfortunate that Douglas could not unite Vancouver Island and British Columbia. He acted as executive head of both colonies, and he supported the colonial office in favour of the union with the gradual extension to the united colony of representative institutions such as existed in Vancouver Island. Local jealousies hindered the project. The Island was in favour of free trade with a view of developing its capital, Victoria, as a free port. As a consequence revenue was derived from direct taxation. On the mainland direct taxation was out of the question. The miners were strongly opposed to it, and the only hope of revenue adequate for the development of the colony's vast natural wealth lay in import duties. In addition, there were sentimental difficulties. Vancouver Island was prospering out of the mining activities of the mainland, and Victoria was rapidly growing in commercial prosperity. The fact that the governor resided there furnished additional irritation. Difficulties, too, presented themselves owing to the agitation in British Columbia for a house of assembly. The Indians still formed a large majority of the population. The white population was scattered and fluctuating. Mining was as yet the chief occupation, and was carried on largely by foreign immigrants who never intended to settle. There were few landowners or business men, and these lived far apart from one another and from the seat of government at New Westminster. The choice thus lay between creating an assembly controlled by a small group who could attend it or by a fluctuating population without any serious interest in the colony beyond a hope for immediate gain. A system of imperfect representation was contemplated and the plan for union abandoned. Hardly, however, had the decision been arrived at, when both colonies began to look on union with favour. Early in 1865 the assembly of Vancouver Island placed on record a desire for unconditional union. Frederick Seymour, who had succeeded Douglas as governor of British Columbia, led an opposition;¹ but as the gold fever subsided there was a general development of opinion that future prosperity lay in a combination of interests on the Pacific coasts, and in 1866 an imperial Act united the two colonies with a single chamber partly elective.² This step led to further progress.

¹ 21 & 22 Victoria, c. 99.

The assembly in Vancouver Island had been abolished. Public sentiment in the Island combined with that on the mainland, and an agitation began not merely for representative but for responsible government. In March 1867 the legislative council, although it had a majority of nominated members, passed a resolution in favour of federation, and asked the governor to take measures for the admission 'on fair and equitable terms' of British Columbia into the dominion. Seymour did not favour the idea, and pointed out difficulties, some of which were valid at the time. Adequate communication with Canada was practically non-existent, and the transfer of the Hudson's Bay Company's lands east of the Rockies had not yet taken place. The governor's diffidence, however, did not damp public enthusiasm. The colonists were quick to grasp the possibilities of progress, both political and material, which inclusion in the dominion implied. In January 1868 a public meeting at Victoria urgently declared in favour of union, and a memorial was forwarded to the Canadian government which claimed that there was general support behind the movement. Terms of admission acceptable to the colony were outlined, and included the assumption by Canada of the public debt of the province, a fixed annual subsidy, provincial responsible government, and adequate representation in the parliament of the dominion. The construction of a wagon-road from Lake Superior to the head of navigation on the Fraser River within a period of two years after the union was laid down as an essential condition. As the Canadian government received no official communication from the colony they forwarded the memorial to England. Two difficulties stood in the way. The imperial government were unwilling to act until the negotiations between Canada and the Hudson's Bay Company had been completed, and Seymour remained obstinate. Meanwhile, agitation continued in the colony and a convention of delegates met at Yale in which the project was urged and terms discussed. Seymour's death took place a few weeks after Cartier and McDougall had completed arrangements in London with the Hudson's Bay Company. Anthony Musgrave, governor of Newfoundland, was appointed his successor on Macdonald's recommendation.¹ Musgrave was a strong believer in British North American federation, and his faith was strengthened by a dispatch from Lord Granville which endorsed federation in unambiguous language and left only the terms open for discussion.² The whole project was debated in the legislature of British Columbia in 1870 and resolutions were carried in its favour. Delegates were sent to Ottawa to arrange terms. An agreement was arrived at in July, and included a promise to begin within two years and to complete within ten years a railway to the Pacific. The terms were approved by the colony at a general election, and ratified by the legislature in the following January. On July 20, 1871, the union came into force, and responsible government was at once introduced in accordance with the express terms agreed on between British Columbia and the government of Canada.¹

¹ F. W. Howay, 'The Attitude of Governor Seymour towards Confederation' (Trans. Royal Society of Canada, 3rd series, vol. xiv, sect. ii, pp. 31 ff.).

² 29 & 30 Victoria, c. 67.

¹ Pope, op. cit., vol. ii, p. 144.

² Granville to Musgrave, August 14, 1869, Colonial Office Papers, G. 350.

Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland still remained without the fold. The latter definitely refused in 1869 to come in, and only once since that date has it shown any desire to reopen negotiations. Macdonald continued to hope for a change of heart, but the 'ancient colony' has preferred to work out its own destiny. In Prince Edward Island anti-federation sentiment developed quickly and with great force. The legislature viewed the idea as 'disastrous to the rights and interests of the people' and declared that Canada could offer no terms which would be acceptable. As a consequence there was no representative of the Island at the Westminster Palace Hotel conference. The premier, James C. Pope, happened to be in London at that time, and although he had voted in the legislature against federation, proposals were made to him that in addition to the general terms agreed on at the Quebec conference, the dominion was prepared to allow the Island $800,000 to extinguish the proprietary rights of the absentee landlords which had hung round the neck of the province for generations. Pope was impressed by the offer, but before it could be laid before the legislature his government suffered defeat. In 1869 Canada made further proposals, but they were again rejected. In 1872 the Island found it difficult to raise the capital necessary for internal development, and the financial needs came to the notice of the banking house of Morton, Rose & Company in London, of which Sir John Rose, a Montreal barrister who had lost silk for signing the annexation manifesto in 1849, was a member. His financial abilities attracted attention in England, and finally resulted in brilliant success in London. Never losing interest in Canada, he kept up correspondence with John A.

¹ See Report of the Canadian cabinet, April 19, 1890 (House of Commons Papers, 194, pp. 11 ff.).

Macdonald, in the course of which he informed him of the situation in Prince Edward Island. Macdonald was cautious. He refused to allow Canada to open negotiations, but he asked Lord Dufferin to inform the lieutenant-governor that the terms of 1869 were still available. The governor telegraphed asking if the debt of the railway would be taken into consideration. The dominion government replied that it was a proper subject for discussion and that any proposals with regard to it would be carefully considered. A few months later, delegates came to Ottawa to arrange a basis of union, and on July 1, 1873, Prince Edward Island joined the Canadian federation.

It lies outside this history to consider the work done by the railway builders of Canada, but amid the hard facts which gave the political dream realization their work is the most romantic. Political and financial circumstances combined to delay the day when Halifax and Vancouver were linked up by steam. When, however, the eastern and western branches of the Canadian Pacific Railway were at last connected and the last spike driven home in November 1885 by Donald Smith, afterwards Lord Strathcona, political faith was made visible across the continent and the lines of steel became symbolical bonds of Canadian national unity. Without the hope and courage of the railway builders and the political vision which refused to be dimmed, the full territorial heritage of the dominion would have remained, as John A. Macdonald said, 'a geographical expression'.¹

[AUTHORITIES.—For the earlier period the material is in Report from the Committee appointed to inquire into the State and Condition of the Countries adjoining to Hudson's Bay (London, 1749); Report from the Select Committee on Hudson's Bay Company (London, 1837); Parliamentary Papers (1819), 'Red River Settlement'; Canadian Archives Report (1897), Note D; The David Thompson Papers (Ontario Archives). Very valuable are: Elliott Coues, New Light on the Earlier History of the Great North-west (3 vols., New York, 1897); J. B. Tyrrell, David Thompson's Narrative of his Explorations in

¹ Macdonald to Northcote, May 1, 1878, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, p. 239.

Western America, 1784-1812 (Toronto, 1916) ; Chester Martin, Lord Selkirk's Work in Canada (Oxford, 1916) ; L. A. Prud'homme, 'Pierre Gaultier de Varennes, Sieur de la Vérendrye' (Trans. Royal Soc. of Canada, 2nd series, vol. xi, sect. i, pp. 9 ff.) ; G. Dugas, L'Ouest Canadien, sa Découverte par le Sieur de la Vérendrye (Montreal, 1896 ; also in English, Montreal, 1905) ; A. Mackenzie, Voyages from Montreal through the Continent of North America, 1789 and 1793 (London, 1801 ; reprint ed. by W. L. Grant, 2 vols., Toronto, 1911). For the later periods consult Colonial Office Papers, series G, 335-59, 360-5 (Canadian Archives) ; Report from the Select Committee on Hudson's Bay Company (London, 1857) ; Hudson's Bay Papers (London, 1859) ; Copy or Extract of Correspondence . . . relating to the Surrender of Rupert's Land, &c. (London, 1869) ; E. H. Oliver, The Canadian North-west : Its Early Development and Legislative Records (2 vols., Ottawa, 1914) ; E. O. S. Scholefield, Report of the Provincial Archives Department of British Columbia (Victoria, 1914), Minutes of the Council of Vancouver Island . . . August 30, 1851, to February 6, 1861 (Victoria, 1918), Minutes of the House of Assembly, Vancouver Island, August 12, 1856, to September 25, 1858 (Victoria, 1918), House of Assembly, Correspondence Book, August 12, 1856, to July 6, 1859 (Victoria, 1918) ; N. F. Black, A History of Saskatchewan and the Old North-west (Regina, 1913) ; E. O. S. Scholefield and F. W. Howay, British Columbia from the Earliest Times to the Present (2 vols., Vancouver, 1914) ; J. N. E. Brown, 'The Evolution of Law and Government in the Yukon Territory' (University of Toronto Studies : History and Economics, vol. ii, 1907). There is no adequate history of the Hudson's Bay Co. : consult Willson, The Great Company (London, 1889) ; Bryce, The Remarkable History of the Hudson's Bay Co. (London, 1900) ; Mackenzie, Selkirk and Simpson (Toronto, 1910) ; Coats and Gosnell, Sir James Douglas (Toronto, 1910).]

CHAPTER XXI

THE DEVELOPMENT OF CANADIAN AUTONOMY

(i) From Federation to 1914

THE development of Canadian autonomy falls naturally into two periods. The first, extending from 1867 to 1914, saw the evolution of full self-government and of authority in commercial matters. It is characterized by growing assurance, slowly developing self-confidence, and that widening interest in economic affairs which belongs to the life of a young nation rich in material possibilities. The second period, from the beginning of the Great War to the present time, is the period of national manhood suddenly matured by the unparalleled events. During it constitutional advances were made which have revolutionized the relationship of Canada to the empire. In dramatic growth and in spectacular achievement these years are the most momentous in Canadian constitutional history.

After the territorial 'rounding off' of the dominion there began to grow up a national emotion.¹ At first this was scattered and unorganized, but in 1870 a group of young men, known as 'the Canada First party', began to lend it a greater influence and a wider life. Of these, W. A. Foster, a Toronto barrister, was the most brilliant. In a lecture entitled Canada First ; or, Our New Nationality, published in 1871, he called on Canadians to strengthen the foundations of their identity and to render the different races homogeneous by the development of an all-Canadian national feeling. For a year or two the party resisted the allurements of politics, but at length it expanded into the Canadian National Association with definite political aims. These included a voice in treaties affecting Canada, the imposition of revenue duties for the fullest encouragement of native industry, and a militia system under Canadian officers. Hopes sprang high when Edward Blake, in his famous speech delivered at Aurora on October 3, 1874, adopted and amplified the platform.¹ Blake urged the cultivation of a Canadian national spirit as a preparation for the fullness of citizenship by 'four millions of Britons who are not free'. Fortunately for the future, Blake soon resumed friendly relations with the liberal party, and the emotion of Canadian nationalism was thus saved from ambiguous affiliations. Both the great historic parties have contributed to its development in sentiment as well as in fact. Indeed, it was insight that led Macdonald to call his protectionist system 'the national policy', for he meant it to be the economic counterpart of national emotion. Laurier's defeat on the reciprocity issue in 1911 was in a large measure due to the fact that Canadians believed that such a system would impair national life. On the other hand, 'the Canada First' movement must not be lightly overlooked. It came at an opportune moment in Canadian history to provide, as it were, an emotional impetus towards nationhood.

¹ For a full discussion see 'The Growth of Canadian National Feeling', by W. S. Wallace (Canadian Historical Review, June 1920).

When Edward Blake became minister of justice in the year following his speech, he must have been convinced that his words were hardly a platform exaggeration, for the dominion was still heavily shackled even in domestic affairs. Legislation was still liable to disallowance. The governor-general was specially instructed to reserve certain classes of bills, and he possessed the right of pardon, a prerogative which the crown in England no longer enjoyed. There was no Canadian control over British immigration. The position of defence was still doubtful with the presence of imperial soldiers, and with an imperial officer in command of Canadian forces. There was no supreme court at Ottawa. Needless to say Canada had little or no voice in international affairs. Under both conservative and liberal administrations extension of Canadian autonomy was achieved, but it was fortunate that the initial steps were made by Blake, as he gave to Canadian nationalism sobriety of judgement, wide scholarship, and legal insight, which were invaluable in the early days of advance.

¹ For a reprint of the speech, see Canadian Historical Review, September 1921.

As minister of justice Blake piloted through parliament the measure which set up the supreme court of Canada. The bill included a clause closing appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council. The government were compelled to withdraw this clause as the imperial cabinet pointed out that the royal assent would be withheld.¹ The court, however, has been a remarkable success. It has received many appeals from the provincial courts which otherwise would have gone to Westminster. It has helped to develop constitutional law and it has lent dignity and confidence to the Canadian judiciary. In the executive sphere Blake's accomplishment was more remarkable.² From the time of federation, Canadian self-government was severely limited by the commissions and instructions issued by the imperial cabinet to the governors-general. They were ordered to refuse assent to any bill for divorce; for grants to themselves; for making paper or other currency legal tender; for imposing differential duties; for interference with the naval or military forces of the crown in the dominion, with treaty obligations, with the royal prerogative, with the property of British subjects not resident in Canada, or with the trade and shipping of the United Kingdom; for re-enacting any measure which had been disallowed or to which assent had been previously refused. In the case of an offender condemned to death they were commanded to withhold or to extend pardon or reprieve according to their own deliberate judgement whether the Canadian ministers concurred therein or not. The case of Ambroise Lépine, a prisoner sentenced to death for his part in the Red River rebellion, brought to the front the entire question of the governor-general's power. In 1875 Lord Dufferin, acting on his instructions, commuted Lépine's sentence to two years' imprisonment with permanent deprivation of political rights. It is true that Dufferin consulted his ministers, but he was careful to explain in an official communication to Blake that he was justified in acting 'according to his independent judgement and on his own personal responsibility'.¹ The case raised in an acute form the subject of the responsibility of the Canadian cabinet for the governor's official acts. Blake visited England, with the result that the imperial government recast the commission and instructions. The enumeration of subjects on which legislation must be reserved was discontinued and the prerogative of pardon must only be exercised on ministerial advice.²

¹ Cf. Nineteenth Century, July 1879, p. 173. See Judicial Committee Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Victoria, c. 69), which places the right of appeal on a statutory basis.

² See Canada Sessional Papers, 1877, No. 13; 1879, No. 181.

During the discussions, Blake submitted to the colonial secretary a memorandum which occupies an important place in the history of Canadian constitutional development. He argued that the governor-general's position should be that of a constitutional monarch, that he should be allowed no personal discretion where the power of pardon was concerned, and that he should be given freedom to assent to all Canadian Acts, leaving the imperial cabinet to disallow them if necessary. The government of Canada must be made responsible for all Canadian affairs which did not involve imperial interests. Blake considered that the latter eventuality would seldom occur; but it could be dealt with when it arose, and no formal record should diminish the sphere of Canadian self-government. He added: 'The existing forms in the case of Canada have been felt for some time to be capable of amendment, for reasons which require that special consideration should be given to her position and which render unsuitable for her the forms which may be eminently suited for some of the colonies. Canada is not merely a colony or a province : she is a dominion composed of an aggregate of seven large provinces federally united under an imperial charter, which expressly recites that her constitution is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. Nay, more ; besides the powers with which she is invested over a large part of the affairs of the inhabitants of the several provinces, she enjoys absolute powers of legislation and administration over the people and territories of the North-west, out of which she has already created one province, and is empowered to create others, with representative institutions. These circumstances, together with the vastness of her area, the numbers of her population, the character of the representative institutions and of the responsible government which as citizens of the various provinces and of Canada her people have so long enjoyed, all point to the propriety of dealing with the question in hand in a manner very different from that which might be fitly adopted with reference to a single and comparatively small and young colony. Besides the general spread of the principles of constitutional freedom, there has been in reference to the colonies a recognized difference between their circumstances, resulting in the application to those in a less advanced condition of a lesser measure of self-government, while others are said to be invested with "the fullest freedom of political government" ; and it may be fairly stated that there is no dependency of the British crown which is entitled to so full an application of the principles of constitutional freedom as the dominion of Canada.' Since Blake's time there has been no friction with reference to either ministerial responsibility, assenting to bills, or granting pardons. This fact in itself amply justifies the changes which he brought about, but the political setting in which Blake framed his position is perhaps of greater importance. Blake was a lifelong advocate of fuller Canadian autonomy, and it is significant that he found himself in later life unable to co-operate with the liberal party when he feared that its economic policy in relation to the United States would tend to complicate and to endanger Canada's political future.¹

¹ Canadian Gazette, Extra, June 19, 1875; Canada Sessional Papers, 1875, No. 11.

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 696 ff.

It was, however, in matters of trade and commerce that the greatest advances were made before 1914. From the establishment of responsible government there was always a tendency to work with Canada in these spheres, which is illustrated by Elgin's reciprocity treaty of 1854 and by Macdonald's work at Washington in 1871, when the question of Canadian fisheries and territorial waters was discussed. On the other hand, it was only when the trade depression of the late seventies forced Canada to seek wider markets for her exports, that the actual problem of commercial treaties came to the front. With the fall of the liberal ministry in 1878, Macdonald sent Galt to England for the purpose of discussing, for the benefit of Canadian trade, tariff agreements with foreign states. Galt made arrangements with the imperial government that in such proposals to France and Spain, the British representatives there should carry on the formal negotiations, 'the settlement of the details of the arrangement being dealt with by Sir Alexander Galt'. This method of procedure conceded Galt's position as the real negotiator, while at the same time it was a clear indication that assent to a Canadian bill imposing differential duties was no longer liable to be withheld. Political changes in France and Spain and the cross-currents of European diplomacy rendered Galt's mission unsuccessful, but beginnings had been made which pointed at least to a new economic group. Four months later, Macdonald, Tupper, Tilley, and Galt discussed in London with the British government the railway situation in Canada. Difficulties in this connexion led to the proposal for the appointment of a permanent Canadian representative in England. A memorandum was drawn up and presented to the British cabinet in August 1879 in which the proposal was justified. Canadian development required more constant and more intimate communication between the two governments than that afforded by formal and official dispatches through the governor-general. Canada was 'no longer an ordinary possession of the crown', and it was evident that many questions would arise demanding personal discussion. It would be a serious inconvenience for Canadian ministers to go constantly to London, and as direct trade negotiations with foreign powers had already been recognized, it seemed reasonable that there should be a permanent representative in England, whom the crown should 'accredit to the foreign court, by association for the special object with the resident minister or other imperial negotiator'. With this end in view, the government of Canada proposed to appoint a Canadian minister to a 'quasi-diplomatic position at the court of St. James'. The memorandum received none too favourable consideration. The colonial secretary threw doubts on the suggested diplomatic character of the office, and also pointed out that the imperial foreign secretary alone could decide on the exact functions which its holder might exercise in foreign affairs.

¹ See Willison, op. cit., vol. ii, pp. 172 ff. ; Skelton, op. cit., vol. i, pp. 419 ff. ; and cf. Tupper, Recollections of Sixty Years, pp. 304 ff.

A dignified answer was returned by the Canadian cabinet. It was pointed out that Canada as a portion of the empire could not carry on strictly diplomatic missions, but the Canadian government had as much right to advise the crown as the imperial government had. Indeed such powers had been conferred on Canada that the imperial government had little claim to give advice on them, and 'in considering many questions of the highest importance, such as the commercial and fiscal policy of the dominion as affecting the United Kingdom, the promotion of imperial interests in the administration and settlement of the interior of the continent, and on many other subjects, indeed on all matters of internal concern, the imperial government and parliament have so far transferred to Canada an independent control that their discussion and settlement have become subjects for mutual consent and concert, and thereby have, it is thought, assumed a quasi-diplomatic character as between her majesty's government representing the United Kingdom per se and the dominion, without in any manner derogating from their general authority as rulers of the entire empire'. This minute of council hinted, it is true, at preferential tariffs within the empire, but the constitutional implication has been rather ignored. Canada was seeking the right in the economic sphere to expand her group life.¹ Finally the British government agreed to the appointment of a 'High Commissioner of Canada in London'. In April 1880 Macdonald laid the correspondence on the table and moved the appointment of Galt, who reached England during the same month, and remained there till 1883. Perhaps there is only one outstanding fact in connexion with Galt's tenure of office. In a speech at Greenock he declared that Canada would not remain satisfied with its present position, and that the empire had completely outgrown its political organization. He turned his back on his own old defence of independence and looked to a federation of all the self-governing British states. The suggestion is of no more and of no less importance than those of a similar nature, but the speech was a remarkable declaration of the growing consciousness of Canadian nationhood.²

¹ For the memorandum, minute of council, and correspondence, see Canada Sessional Papers, 1880, No. 105, and compare Macdonald to Galt, February 26, 1882, and to Lord Stanley, August 15, 1890, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, pp. 285, 471.

² A. T. Galt, The Relations of the Colonies to the Empire : Present and Future. Macdonald advised Galt to use discretion in his public utterances lest he might complicate the Canadian government on account of the position which he held : 'The Canadian High Commissioner is now acknowledged to be an ambassador,

Tupper, who succeeded Galt, was recognized by the imperial government not merely as adviser but as actual negotiator in commercial treaties, and in 1893 he signed such a treaty with France. These concessions implied others. It soon became evident that it would not be possible for Great Britain to make in future general commercial treaties which would bind Canada, and the plan was soon adopted of including a clause which gave Canada the right to adhere or to refuse to adhere to such treaties. This in turn raised the further question whether Canada should be bound by old treaties in the framing of which there had been neither consultation with Canada nor agents acting for Canada. This problem took on further difficulties when Canada began to think of arranging a scheme of preferential trade with the mother country. It was found that a treaty of 1862 with Belgium and of 1865 with the North German Confederation precluded such preference without the inclusion of these two countries and of course of all countries with most-favoured-nation clauses in their treaties. In 1894 the matter was discussed at a conference at Ottawa.¹ Imperial preference was ruled out of practical politics by the British government, who, however, laid down in the following year certain general regulations covering separate commercial treaties with foreign states in the matter of dominion trade. The treaty must be between the imperial government, not the dominion, and the foreign power, since the imperial government would be held responsible for keeping the terms of the treaty. To grant Canada the power of independent negotiation would concede its sovereignty in international law and would amount to the admission that Canada had ceased to be a part of the empire, a result desired neither by Great Britain nor the dominion. Negotiations must be conducted by the imperial and as such it is his duty to be persona grata to the government to which he is accredited': Macdonald to Galt, February 21, 1883, Pope, op. cit., p. 298.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 7553.

representative at the foreign court aided by a Canadian representative as a second plenipotentiary or as a subordinate. Any treaty which they might conclude would be signed by the plenipotentiaries only after its terms had been approved by the imperial and Canadian governments. It would ultimately be ratified by the crown on the advice of the British government if the Canadian government so desired ; or, in the event of legislation being requisite to make its terms effective, if the Canadian legislature so desired. Conditions of negotiations were laid down : concessions made to any foreign power must be made to any other foreign power having by existing treaties most-favoured-nation rights in Canada ; any concessions so made must be extended without compensation to all British possessions ; no concession must be accepted from a foreign government which would be prejudicial to other parts of the empire.¹ These principles were once again laid down by Sir Edward Grey in 1907. He informed the imperial representatives in Paris and Rome that Canada desired to begin negotiations with the French and Italian governments in order to promote closer commercial relations. He outlined the conditions of 1895, but stated that he did not think it necessary in this case to adhere to the strict letter of those regulations, which aimed rather to prevent the dominion from beginning negotiations unknown to and independent of the imperial government than to curtail its activities when there was mutual confidence. The selection of the negotiator was chiefly a matter of convenience, and in this case the Canadian prime minister and minister of finance were obviously most suited to carry out arrangements, and they would doubtless inform the imperial representative from time to time of the progress of the negotiations. The latter, in the event of a successful issue, would sign the agreement jointly with the Canadian negotiator, to whom full powers would be granted for the special purpose.¹ Of course, all treaties made under these instructions of 1895 and 1907 have been subject to the fullest imperial consideration before being finally concluded. Canada, on several occasions, has made informal trade arrangements through the consular representatives of foreign states, but these have not been considered as treaties, and have, therefore, not been ratified by the imperial government. The arrangements, however, were carried into effect by orders in council, and an opportunity was thus given through the governor-general for imperial objections.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 7824.

The Canadian feeling in favour of a British preference emphasized the desire that all old treaties which curtailed the freedom of Canadian action should be abrogated. After discussions at the colonial conference in 1897, the British government arranged the termination of the treaties with Belgium and Germany to which reference has been made.² In 1899 the principle was begun that, in concluding new commercial treaties, Canada should be given the right of separate withdrawal as well as of separate adherence. Finally, the position has been established, through the conclusion of a long series of treaties between Great Britain and powers with whom most-favoured-nation treaties existed, that the crown on giving a year's notice can withdraw with respect to Canada or any self-governing dominion, without hurting the validity of the treaty in relation to other parts of the empire. Thus Canada is now able to make commercial arrangements with a foreign state without being under the compulsion of extending similar treatment to other powers under rights established by existing treaties.

In the matter of commercial treaties the development has reached this position. Canada is not bound by any trade treaty to which its consent has not been given. Canada will be consulted by the imperial government when a general commercial treaty is under consideration in order that special concessions, if desired by Canada, may be secured. If Canada wishes to establish closer commercial relations with a foreign state, the imperial government will appoint Canadian plenipotentiaries to carry on negotiations, and they will sign jointly with an imperial representative any treaty which may arise out of the discussions. The interests of the empire at large must not be sacrificed and Canada must extend to the empire all concessions granted to a foreign power. The treaty must be ratified by the crown on the advice of the imperial ministry acting on the request of Canada.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, H. C. (1910), 129.

² Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 8596.

Closely allied to economic matters are international conferences on miscellaneous questions of general concern—such as protection of fur seals or the opium traffic. To these the dominions and even their constituent provinces have sent representatives, but where an international agreement was aimed at as the outcome of such a conference it was formerly the custom for the dominions to have no representatives or merely to help in advising the imperial delegates. Changes gradually took place which culminated in 1912, when the four great dominions sent delegates to the Radio-telegraphic conference, who acted with full powers, under the great seal of the United Kingdom, as plenipotentiaries for their respective states. The custom then established has been continued at other international conferences held since that date. The fundamental change lies in the fact that Canadian plenipotentiaries, for example, are no longer merely included among the British group, which must cast their vote as a unit. As arrangements now are, Canada has plenipotentiaries of its own acting independent of those from Great Britain, and may accordingly differ in opinion from the imperial view. The position is an international recognition of a constitutional anomaly, for the British crown may express several divergent decisions. On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that the Canadian plenipotentiaries receive their fullness of authority at the hands of the imperial executive, and that the final ratification rests with the crown acting on the advice of imperial ministers. The anomaly can thus be overcome although circumstances will hardly arise to create the necessity. Its existence, however, bears excellent witness to new difficulties created by the growing nationhood of the dominions.

During this period there have been no remarkable developments in the sphere covered by strict political treaties. As international law stands Canada cannot make an independent political agreement. It is clearly recognized that the crown must act on the imperial cabinet's advice in making a political treaty for the simple reason that international responsibility lies with Great Britain. On the other hand, no political treaty as such can change the law of Great Britain or of Canada. If Canada is concerned, the duty of making the treaty effective lies with Canada, acting as a rule through the Canadian parliament. Within the limitations imposed by international law there has been growth. Since Elgin's time a working principle has been recognized that Canada would be consulted where Canadian questions were involved. In 1886 this principle was given a fuller meaning, when the imperial government repudiated a theory laid down by the United States that Canada, as a non-sovereign state, could not deal with any matter involving treaty rights.¹ This position received additional sanction in 1910, when the international Hague tribunal provided for legislation by the Canadian parliament in the matter of the fishery dispute with the United States.² The right of the imperial government to hold the place of ultimate interpreter of a political treaty has never been disputed by Canada, but in 1908, when an arbitration treaty was concluded with the United States, Great Britain expressly reserved the right to obtain Canadian concurrence before accepting an agreement for submitting a matter to arbitration in which Canada was concerned. Canada thus secured the right of refusing a treaty where Canada was concerned. The problem of ultimate interpretation is simplified, for as a rule Canada will not be involved in a political treaty without a previous record of its willingness to be bound by it. It is clear that, within the empire at least, Canadian autonomy in political treaties has already reached almost complete fullness.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 4937 ; cf. Tupper, op. cit., p. 177, and Borden, Canadian Constitutional Studies, p. 76.

² Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 5396.

At the imperial conference of 1911, the question of general international agreements of a quasi-political nature was discussed.¹ Matters of vital importance to the self-governing dominions had been dealt with in the Declaration of London which arose out of the Hague conference of 1907. Australia formally protested against the failure to consult the dominions. The imperial government defended themselves by stating that the dominions had never been previously represented at the Hague, and indeed had expressed no wish for such representation. The imperial conference agreed that the dominions should be consulted when instructions were issued to British delegates at future conventions, and that, when agreements were reached which might affect the dominions, they would not be signed without previous consideration by the dominions. In other international agreements where time and circumstances permitted and the dominions were concerned, a similar procedure would normally follow. The Australian prime minister made a suggestion, which was not pressed, that the dominions should enter into direct communications with the foreign office, but Sir Wilfrid Laurier made it clear that Canada did not wish to establish as a rule of procedure the principle of consultation on all international affairs. He maintained that such general consultation would imply that Canada had undertaken responsibilities which he believed she was not prepared to carry out. An immediate result followed from the discussions. The delegates were invited to attend a meeting of the committee of imperial defence, when the foreign secretary explained the general scheme of British foreign policy and its relations to the defences of the empire. The political situation in Europe was at the moment extremely threatening, and the dominions approved, as far as they could apart from their legislatures, of the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. It was also arranged that members of the cabinets of the dominions should be invited to all the future meetings when naval and military matters affecting them were under discussion, and that a defence committee should be organized in each dominion. Reference to these arrangements naturally brings up the growth of Canadian control in defence. It is possible to outline shortly the development up to 1911 ; but from that date the consideration involves foreign affairs in such a way that it is impossible to study either subject in isolation.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 5745.

The grant of responsible government implied that the imperial parliament would throw the onus of maintaining internal peace on the self-governing colonies, and in 1862 the imperial house of commons resolved that, while all parts of the empire must receive imperial aid against possible attack arising out of imperial policy, the colonies with responsible governments should bear the expenses of their own internal defence and ought to assist in external defence.¹ The application of this resolution to Canada was slow, even after federation.² The dominion had been given exclusive control over 'militia, military and naval service, and defence'.³ The first Canadian cabinet contained a minister of militia and defence ; but Canada

¹ Hansard, ser. 3, vol. clxv, pp. 1032 ff.

² For Macdonald's opinion on the policy see Macdonald to Carnarvon, April 14, 1870, Pope, op. cit., p. 133.

³ British North America Act, 1867, sect. 91.

only gradually assumed authority. Imperial money was freely spent on fortifications and an imperial force was available under an imperial officer during the Red River rebellion of 1870. When the more serious North-west rebellion broke out in 1885 Canadian forces under Canadian officers coped successfully with the situation. The imperial government, however, continued to garrison Halifax and Esquimalt owing to their strategic importance. The repeated disasters to British arms during the Boer war caused Canada to offer to maintain garrisons at Canadian expense, and imperial troops were finally withdrawn.¹ At the conclusion of that war a new naval policy reduced the importance of these ports, and in 1910 arrangements were concluded to hand over to Canada the admiralty property, with the proviso that docking and coaling facilities should be provided for the imperial navy and that the naval dockyards should be kept in a state of adequate repair.² With the departure of imperial forces, the rule that an imperial officer should be in command of the Canadian militia became more absurd. Indeed, it had never worked out satisfactorily. The appointment lay with the governor-general in council, but many of these imperial officers were indiscreet and not at all anxious to recognize that they were under the Canadian ministry. Canadian opinion began to call for the 'appointment of a Canadian officer without reference to the horse guards or war office'. The dominion government moved slowly, but insisted that the method of appointment should not be formal and that consultation and an exchange of views should take place with the imperial cabinet.³ The arrangement was unsatisfactory, and ended in 1904 in the dismissal of Lord Dundonald by the Canadian government for indiscretion.¹ A new plan was established by an imperial Act, and the practice by which the commanding officer of the Canadian militia was always an imperial officer was discontinued.² The right of course remains for the imperial government to station troops and to recruit for the imperial army in Canada, and the imperial Army Act cannot be overridden by Canadian legislature. On the other hand, the imperial government has no control of any kind over Canadian troops raised for home defence, and there is no agreement between the two governments binding Canada to send troops overseas.³ Any aid given outside Canadian territory to the empire depends entirely on the will of the Canadian legislature for the time being. Canadian soldiers serve overseas voluntarily ; or, if organized, under an ad hoc Canadian law. In the control of this supreme obligation of citizenship, Canadian autonomy is complete.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 2565.

² See Naval Establishments in British Possessions Act, 1909, and Orders in Council, October 23, 1910, and May 4, 1911.

³ Macdonald to Lorne, to Knutsford, to Connaught, August 18, 20, 1890, Pope, op. cit., pp. 473 ff.

In the matter of naval defence little has been done, as the imperial navy rendered adequate protection. The European situation became, however, so complicated in 1909 that, out of consultations, Canada offered to create a naval force to operate on the Atlantic and the Pacific and reaffirmed its obligations in connexion with the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt. An Act was passed in 1910 regulating the force and providing for a building programme.⁴ The principle was laid down that the fleet should be under the absolute control of the dominion, but provision was made that in cases of emergency and under proper authority the ships and men should be at the disposal of the crown for general service in the royal navy. The debates

¹ House of Commons Debates (1904), pp. 4580 ff. For an admirable account of the Dundonald episode, see Skelton, op. cit., vol. ii, pp. 196 ff.

² 4 Edward VII, c. 23.

³ See an interesting proposal, however, made by Macdonald in 1885: 'The reciprocal aid to be given by the colonies and England should be made a matter of treaty, deliberately entered into and settled on a permanent basis': Macdonald to Tupper, March 12, 1885, Pope, op. cit., p. 338 ; cf. ibid., p. 468.

⁴ 1 & 2 George V, c. 43.

on this Act are of great interest.¹ Opinions were expressed that the dominion was doing too little, that it was setting up a claim to remain neutral when Great Britain was at war, that steps were being taken to involve Canada in foreign wars in which it had no interests. Laurier's position was clearly stated. Whether Canada liked it or not, Canada was necessarily in a state of war when Great Britain was at war. Canada could not afford to be indifferent to this fact and must be prepared to do its share in defending itself. But the prime minister was careful to state that Canadian forces would not be placed automatically at the disposal of Great Britain, and that Canada did not surrender the right of deciding whether it would take part in a war or give no aid. Mr. Borden, the leader of the opposition, directed his criticism mainly against the government's refusal to co-operate in all British wars and against the decision to create a Canadian fleet rather than to offer an immediate monetary contribution to the imperial building programme.

The fall of the Laurier government in 1911 found the Canadian plans unadvanced, and the conservatives did not desire to forward them. Mr. Borden visited England, and on December 5, 1912, he laid on the table of the house an admiralty memorandum prepared at his request.² He emphasized the position which he had taken in parliament the previous year and outlined a vote for building ships of the first strength to be placed at the disposal of the admiralty, but capable of retransference to the dominion if a future decision should create a Canadian navy. The senate rejected the proposals on a strict party vote. Meanwhile a step of great importance was taken at the instance of the Canadian prime minister. On December 10, 1912, the colonial secretary embodied in a dispatch the principles agreed on in 1911 by the imperial defence committee and afterwards provisionally confirmed by Mr. Borden. Among these was the suggestion that a Canadian cabinet minister should attend meetings of the committee, and that a committee of defence should be organized by the Canadian government. Mr. Borden saw no difficulties in a Canadian minister residing some months of the year in London, but he expressed a desire that such a minister should receive in confidence full and complete information relating to foreign affairs and should have free access to all British ministers with this end in view. The imperial government agreed to the suggestion, but pointed out that the committee was an advisory, not an executive body, and that ultimate responsibility remained with the imperial cabinet.¹ As a matter of fact, Mr. Borden merely arranged for the working in a developed form of previous proposals, and on his part the colonial secretary explained that the natural and laudable desire of the Canadian government did not involve the difficult problems of an empire constitution or of taxation. Mr. Borden, in referring to the matter in the Canadian house of commons, saw in the arrangement only a provisional plan, but he struck a new note. The admiralty memorandum, it is true, laid stress on the fact that the imperial government were prepared in the future as in the past to supply the resources necessary for imperial defence, and that there was no desire to influence Canadian public opinion or to interfere in any way with the Canadian parliament in making a decision on a matter which was exclusively within its jurisdiction. Mr. Borden, however, saw in the whole discussions, in the proposals relating to the imperial defence committee, and in the naval situation in Europe an important implication. Great Britain was willing that the burden of the defence of the empire should be shared. In this connexion Mr. Borden declared, 'When Great Britain no longer assumes sole responsibility for defence upon the high seas, she can no longer undertake to assume sole responsibility for or sole control of foreign policy, which is closely, vitally, constantly associated with defence in which the dominions participate'. Mr. Borden saw clearly that participation in defence would bring with it, inevitably and as an outcome of Canadian public opinion—when that participation was arranged and confirmed by the Canadian parliament—the demand for a voice in the councils of the empire touching the momentous issues of peace and war and in the control of foreign policy out of which they arose. Developments were slow even in connexion with the immediate proposals. It was not till after Lord Strathcona's death in 1914 that Sir George Perley, a Canadian cabinet minister, was appointed to perform the duties of high commissioner, while carrying out those of resident minister in London. The appointment, belated though it was, was evidence that the Canadian government was prepared to link up Canada with the defence of the empire through the presence of a responsible minister in England.

¹ House of Commons Debates (1909-10), pp. 1732 ff.

² Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 6513.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 6560 ; cf. Viscount Esher, The Committee of Imperial Defence : Its Functions and Potentialities (London, 1912).

The developments which have been considered afford ample illustration of the workings of the principle of consultation, but no record would be at all adequate without a reference at least to the various conferences which have been held regularly since 1887, at first under the title of colonial conferences. A vast amount of work has been accomplished and, as has appeared, many advances of a distinct nature have been the outcome. Of course, the share in empire responsibility has been nominal, but Canada received an insight into international problems and its national consciousness developed to such an extent that any proposals for a more real partnership were abandoned. Indeed, the conferences themselves provided an opportunity for a very definite attitude. In April 1905 the colonial secretary proposed to change the name to that of imperial councils, and that a permanent imperial commission should be created with offices in London for the civil affairs of the empire. The Canadian government issued a reply stating that they considered that the name, if changed at all, should be changed by the conferences, and they proposed that of 'imperial conference', which was accepted by the colonial conference of 1907. The suggestion was accompanied with a reasoned explanation: 'they entertain with some doubt the proposal to change the name of the colonial conference to that of the imperial council, which they apprehend would be interpreted as marking a step distinctly in advance of the position hitherto attained in the discussions of the relations between the mother country and the colonies. As the committee [i.e. the Canadian cabinet] understand the phrase, a conference is a more or less unconventional gathering for informal discussion of public questions, continued, it may be, from time to time, as circumstances external to itself may render expedient, but possessing no faculty or power of binding action. The assembly of colonial ministers which met in 1887, 1897, and 1902 appears to the committee to fulfil these conditions. The term council, on the other hand, indicates, in the view of your excellency's ministers, a more formal assemblage, possessing an advisory and deliberative character, and in conjunction with the word "imperial" suggesting a permanent institution which, endowed with a continuous life, might eventually come to be regarded as an encroachment upon the full measure of autonomous legislative and administrative power now enjoyed by all the self-governing colonies'. The proposal for a commission was also criticized, because the Canadian government could not 'wholly divest themselves of the idea that such a commission might conceivably interfere with the working of responsible government'.¹

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 1785. The conference of 1907, in addition to accepting Canada's suggested title, arranged the constitution for future conferences. An important advance was made when the conference agreed, after strong insistence by Canada and Australia, that future conferences

We stand perhaps too near these years to form a clear historical estimate of their constitutional importance, but this minute of the Canadian cabinet affords perhaps the best insight into the progress or lack of progress. The most constant and powerful motive during these years was that Canadian autonomy should not be damaged. As far as it is at present possible to make any judgement, that influence seems to have been sufficiently strong to merit the statement that it was the outcome of Canadian public opinion. It is impossible to study the processes through which actual advances came without being convinced that they took place in those spheres where Canada thought her autonomy was not endangered but rather advanced. They have thus been consolidated and become part of Canadian constitutional consciousness. On the other hand, it would seem that certainly up to 1912 no Canadian statesman was prepared to bring forward large and new proposals in relation to defence and foreign affairs. When reasons are sought there can be little doubt that this attitude was guided by an insight into and a correct reading of Canadian public opinion. There was abroad a sufficiently strong belief to allow a generalization that Canadians feared an excess even of consultation in these matters because it might imply some surrender of self-government ; while any proposals towards an empire constitution through which control might be regularized were looked askance on as the inevitable pooling of a certain amount of Canadian autonomy. Doubtless it is quite possible to recall much evidence on the other side, and not a few Canadians have expressed opinions in favour of giving constitutional effect in defence and foreign policy to Canada's national status ; but such evidence must not be exaggerated. Just because of its exceptional nature it has received, like most should be ' between his majesty's government and the governments of the self-governing dominions beyond the seas ' and not between the colonial office and the dominions.

exceptional matters, a larger amount of public notice than the general pedestrian opinions which, being ordinary, command no notoriety. Statesmen like Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Doherty have spoken during this period of a necessary co-operation in foreign affairs, but always in connexion with defence. Up to 1914, however, little that was effective was done to arrive at a policy of defence for the empire, and it is difficult to estimate how much influence these statesmen exercised in these matters. The fact seems clear that the one outstanding emphasis has been on complete self-government and on the refusal to become committed to a legal, constitutional, organized policy for the empire which would bind Canada as a consenting party in an imperial responsible executive. Many motives have been suggested to explain this state of mind—selfishness, lack of international consciousness, national youth, and so on. The political thinker need not necessarily concern himself with these—all or none of which may have been at work, but he cannot be blind to the wisdom which refuses to make constitutional advances until public opinion is ready for them. There has been no dispute during the period that territorially Canada was at war when Great Britain was at war, but what has been avoided with deliberate purpose was the acceptance of principles implying aid in war, among which was a voice in foreign policy. The delay in sending Sir George Perley to London is in itself significant. In spite of the advance made in the proposals and arrangements of 1912, Canada does not seem to have been in any hurry to rush into wider fields, and these only consultative. The outbreak of the Great War undoubtedly destroyed the normal opportunity of watching at work the constitutional ideas of Sir Robert Borden's ministry, differing as they did from those of his predecessor, and it must as a consequence remain problematical to decide how far they carried with them Canadian public opinion.

(ii) 1914 to the Present Time

When the British government declared war against Germany on August 4, 1914, the declaration brought to the front the exact relationship between Canada and Great Britain. Hostilities were begun on the sole responsibility of the imperial government. Canada had no voice in a situation in which it had a vital interest. It is true that there was little time before the fatal event to carry on consultations, and that Canada had little opportunity to weigh the tragic import, but the very suddenness of the crisis served to bring into greater relief the vagueness of the constitutional ties. Not only was Great Britain solely responsible for the declaration of war, but the decision of the imperial government involved Canada automatically. The legal consequences were clear before the world. Canada was at war with Germany, and, by subsequent imperial declarations, with all the German allies. Canadian citizens became the legal enemies of those nations against whom the imperial government began hostilities, and Canadian territory was legally liable to invasion or to attack. Of course, the outbreak of the war did not create these conditions; but the immensity of the struggle revealed in an unprecedented way to Canadians the implications of their place in the empire. It was well that the issues were as clear as they were at the beginning, otherwise the consequences of such a gigantic struggle to a country in the full tide of national development might have endangered imperial unity.

The declaration of war doubtless laid stress on Canada's legal limitations, but it also emphasized the autonomy which Canada had achieved. In every detail the imperial government acted with a scrupulous regard for Canada's status. Though the necessity was pressing and the situation unparalleled, no demand was made for men or money. Not even the slightest influence was brought to bear by the imperial government which might have impaired Canadian authority or wounded

Canadian sentiment. Neither imperial legislation nor the exercise of the prerogative infringed Canadian autonomy. Where legislation was necessary it was left open to Canada to accept or to reject it, and when the war prerogative was brought into operation, care was taken that it should cover only powers clearly and essentially belonging to the crown and that Canada should be left free in other matters to deal with war conditions. Imperial proclamations dealing, for example, with high treason and its by-products were merely due and legal notice to citizens of the empire as a whole. British ships registered in Canada were excluded from the operations of the imperial Shipping Acts.¹ Canadians temporarily resident in Great Britain were explicitly exempted from the military service imposed on certain classes of residents in Great Britain by imperial legislation. When the imperial parliament saw fit to strengthen the law against aliens and against trading with the enemy, no attempt was made to bind Canada. Even the Naturalization Act of 1918, touching as it did such a fundamental matter as allegiance to the crown, was not applied to Canada. In addition, the constitutional rights and conventions arrived at before 1914 were strictly observed. The imperial government had no connexion of any kind with the raising of Canadian troops, and Canadian military and naval activities remained entirely and exclusively in the hands of the Canadian government and legislature. The imperial government never once thought of exercising its perfectly legal right of recruiting men in Canada. It would be possible to illustrate from many other angles the meticulous care exercised by the imperial authorities in order to preserve fully Canadian autonomy.

Perhaps this emphasis was responsible for a certain executive aloofness between the government of Canada and the imperial government in the early years of the war. Indeed Canada did not appear interested in the suggestions for an imperial conference which were abroad in 1915, and was content with a promise that when the time came the imperial government would consult most fully the Canadian prime minister and discuss possible terms of peace. On the other hand, Sir George Perley's presence in London at the outbreak of the war afforded opportunities for consultation. The imperial government carried out loyally the arrangements of 1912 and entered into the fullest communications with him, as they also did with Sir Robert Borden when he visited England in the summer of 1915, going even so far as to invite him to be present at meetings of the British cabinet. Perhaps, however, at this period the nearest approach to concerted action was taken by the economic conference at Paris in June 1916, when Sir George Foster represented Canada. Although ministers from all the dominions visited England there was no effective partnership within the empire. Sir Robert Borden slowly began to grasp the political situation. He laid stress in England on the status of the dominions, and pointed out that their participation in the war must lead to participation in foreign policy. He thus assisted in developing an opinion that there had been lack of vision in not bringing together at once the statesmen of the empire. Doubtless the tremendous burden of local problems weighed heavy in these early years, and the overwhelming pressure of the ordeal left little room for reconstructions. There can, however, be little doubt that the desire on the part of the imperial government to respect Canadian autonomy was carried to too great a length if it helped to hold back proposals from the imperial government for real co-operation. When the opportunity at length came there was abroad a general feeling that the step should have been taken early in the war.

¹ Difficulties arose, however, over the claim made by the imperial government to requisition ships owned and registered in Canada. This claim was controverted by the Canadian cabinet, January 30, 1917: Borden, op. cit., pp. 121 ff.

When a new government was formed in the United Kingdom in December 1916, plans were at once forthcoming for development, owing to the urgent necessity of the situation created by the war. With Mr. Lloyd George as prime minister, an idea grew up that a large cumbersome cabinet was an inefficient body in the crisis. As a consequence a war cabinet was created. Whatever its success or failure, its creation marked an important epoch in the problem of empire. For the moment an imperial conference of the traditional type was ruled out of practical politics, and on December 14 Canada was invited to send representatives to London for the purpose of consultation. The invitation explained the nature and novelty of the meeting. The imperial government asked the Canadian prime minister 'to attend a special and continuous series of meetings of the war cabinet, in order to consider urgent questions affecting the prosecution of the war, the possible conditions on which, in agreement with our allies, we could consent to its termination, and the problems which will then immediately arise. For the purpose of these meetings your prime minister will be a member of the war cabinet.' Canada was represented at all sessions of the war cabinet, and thus took part in consultations on foreign policy and on defence. A resolution was passed expressing a hope that at the conclusion of hostilities the imperial cabinet 'should consist of the prime minister of the United Kingdom and such of his colleagues as deal specially with imperial affairs and of the prime minister of each of the dominions or some specially accredited alternate, possessed of equal authority'. On May 17, 1917, Mr. Lloyd George explained the principles governing the war cabinet in the house of commons. The purpose aimed at was 'that the responsible heads of the governments of the empire, with those ministers who are specially entrusted with the conduct of imperial policy, should meet together at regular intervals to confer about foreign policy and matters connected therewith and come to decisions with regard to them which, subject to the control of their own parliaments, they will then severally execute. By this means they will be able to obtain full information about all aspects of imperial affairs, and to determine by consultation together the policy of the empire in its most vital aspects, without infringing in any degree the autonomy which its parts at present enjoy. To what constitutional developments this may lead we do not attempt to settle. The whole question for perfecting the mechanism for "continuous consultation" about imperial and foreign affairs between the "autonomous nations of an imperial commonwealth" will be reserved for the consideration of that special conference which will be summoned as soon as possible after the war to readjust the constitutional relations of the empire'.¹ Sir Robert Borden emphasized the changed status in various speeches.² The prime minister of England was in the war cabinet only primus inter pares, and each nation preserved in full its autonomy, its self-government, and its ministerial responsibility. Prior to the organization, he declared, Canada lacked full national status, because the imperial government was the main factor in the foreign policy of the empire. With the creation of the war cabinet inferiority of status had disappeared, as the dominions had been admitted into equality of consultation. He described the war cabinet as 'a cabinet of governments' in which the Canadian prime minister was responsible to his own parliament and to his own people, without which no conclusions arrived at could be carried out.

When the war cabinet of the United Kingdom was thus expanded, it was believed that an imperial conference would be unnecessary, but circumstances altered the situation and as a matter of fact imperial conferences were held in 1917 and in 1918. In these, general problems and questions of minor importance compared with those to which the war cabinet gave its attention were discussed. The only organic change from the constitution of the imperial conferences lay in the fact that the secretary of state for the colonies and not Mr. Lloyd George presided over the imperial conferences. In the conference of 1917 the following important resolutions on the constitution of the empire were passed on the motion of Sir Robert Borden : 'The imperial war conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional arrangements of the component parts of the empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special imperial conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities. They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the dominions as autonomous nations of an imperial commonwealth and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the rights of the dominions and of India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action, founded on consultation, as the several governments may determine'. Sir Robert Borden was emphatic that future changes must be based on these foundations and must fully recognize the rights of the dominions to a voice in foreign policy and foreign relations. He pointed out that the willing acceptance of these principles by Great Britain was in itself an immense stride in advance. Equally significant for Canada was the statement of General Smuts that the resolutions negatived the federal solution to the constitutional problems of the empire.¹

¹ War Cabinet : Report for 1917. Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 9005.

² See specially his speeches to the Empire Parliamentary Association April 3, 1917, and June 21, 1918.

The war conference of 1918 did not disclose in its published

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 8566.

proceedings any further resolutions of a constitutional nature, but a lengthy discussion took place on the channel of communication between the dominions and the imperial government. The former felt that their new status rendered communications through the colonial office undesirable. The colonial secretary admitted that the older methods could not remain indefinitely in use, but he pointed out that there would be a certain amount of impracticability in expecting the imperial prime minister to carry the additional burden contemplated by the change and that the office of the governor-general should not be forgotten. Finally the matter under discussion was referred to the imperial war cabinet, on a resolution from the conference that development was necessary and that the war cabinet should consider the creation of suitable machinery.¹ As a result the war cabinet arrived at the following arrangement: 'The prime ministers of the dominions, as members of the imperial war cabinet, have the right of direct communication with the prime minister of the United Kingdom and vice versa. Such communication should be confined to questions of cabinet importance. The prime ministers themselves are the judges of such questions. Telegraphic communications between the prime ministers should, as a rule, be conducted through the colonial office machinery, but this will not exclude the adoption of more direct means of communication in exceptional circumstances. In order to secure continuity in the work of the imperial war cabinet and a permanent means of consultation during the war on the more important questions of common interest, the prime minister of each dominion has the right to nominate a cabinet minister either as a resident or visitor in London to represent him at meetings of the imperial war cabinet, to be held regularly between the plenary sessions.'²

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 9177.

² War Cabinet : Report for 1918, Cmd. 325.

It is necessary at this point to examine the developments with great care as there has been a tendency to lend them at least an emotional exaggeration. Firstly, the use of the term 'cabinet' to describe the meetings of empire ministers has led to the belief that the war cabinet was an executive body for the empire. This belief is unwarranted. The war cabinet had no prime minister—only a president—and his colleagues were not his own selection, but were chosen by the cabinets of the dominions. Collective responsibility did not exist. Each member was directly responsible to his own parliament. Decisions arrived at remained mere decisions until concurred in by each dominion cabinet and approved of by each dominion parliament. If a dominion prime minister failed to obtain such concurrence or approval he did not suffer the penalty of being excluded. More important still, if the British members failed to carry the goodwill of the dominion members on any matters, they could have their wishes carried out, provided no new legislation was necessary, through the ordinary channels of the British departments of state. Indeed, where agreement was reached, and where the dominion ministers obtained the necessary authority from their states to make these agreements actual, the ultimate and legal responsibility lay with the imperial cabinet. The imperial war cabinet differed in degree and not in kind from the imperial conferences. The former dealt with the vital and overwhelming problems of an unparalleled tragedy, the latter with problems commonplace in comparison. Since the peace, the position has become clearer, and Canada has made no effort to take advantage of the technical resolution of 1918. Doubtless this was natural with a special constitutional conference ahead. The imperial conference of 1921, however, shelved such a conference by a resolution stating that no advantages could be gained from it. Mr. Lloyd George dissociated the imperial government from a current belief that the imperial government were dissatisfied with the constitution of the empire and were in favour of revolutionary changes. He expressed himself satisfied with the progress achieved through full and free consultation between the prime ministers. He welcomed the idea of a Canadian minister at Washington. He emphasized that the dominions had been 'accepted fully into the comity of nations by the whole world', and that they were 'equal partners in the dignities and the responsibilities of the British commonwealth', with 'liberty as its binding principle . . . based not on force but on goodwill and a common understanding'. Mr. Meighen, then prime minister of Canada, got no nearer any concrete proposals, and the conference closed with a significant address to the king pointing out its 'unanimous conviction that the most essential of the links that bind our widely spread peoples is the crown'.¹

Before leaving the subject of Canadian autonomy it is necessary to consider shortly Canada's relation to the peace conference and to the league of nations. The imperial government early in the war had assured the dominions that they would be consulted on the terms of peace. When it came to the actual peace conference there were discussions over the method of representation. It seemed natural and reasonable that the British empire should be represented by a single delegation on which Canadian ministers might serve, but which would act as a unit. On the other hand, the methods already referred to in connexion with the Radio-telegraphic conference appeared more suitable to the new conditions, especially as Canada pressed for separate representation. An agreement was reached that the dominions should be secured a place equal to that of the smaller powers and that their solidarity with the United Kingdom should be maintained. In order that international effect should be given to this agreement, the supreme war council altered their original plans in order to admit the dominions separately. The British empire, the

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 1474.

United States, France, Italy, and Japan were assigned five delegates, the lesser powers were grouped into classes having three, two, and one representative for each state within each class, and Canada was assigned two delegates. Each delegation had the right to set up a panel from which the delegates present on any occasion might be chosen, and Canadian delegates might be included by this panel system in the representation of the British empire. Canada thus enjoyed double representation, and thus full opportunity was given for the expression of Canadian views, while it stood before the world as an autonomous member of the British empire, which for the first time appeared under that name at a peace conference, and presented its proposals and decisions for the first time after consultation with the dominions and India. When practical considerations necessitated the handing over of actual decisions to the council of four, Canadian interests could be secured only by pressure on Mr. Lloyd George. There was doubtless a certain amount of irritation owing to this decision. On the other hand, even France and Italy felt that there was something anomalous in the presence of dominion delegates at the conference, and a rule was made that the dominions should not possess a vote apart from the British empire, if formal voting were necessary in any matter. Constitutionally the rule is of interest, although practically it was of little importance as the council of four controlled the situation. The mode adopted of signing the treaty was as follows. In the treaty with Germany the contracting parties were the British empire and the Allied and Associated powers.¹ Canada did not appear as a distinct sovereign state, for that would have been tantamount to a declaration that the empire had been dissolved, but Sir George Foster and Mr. Doherty were included among 'the representatives of his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India ', and they signed the treaty as representing the king for the dominion of Canada. This method was followed in the other treaties except that of June 28, 1919, when the king, subject to the United States undertaking a similar obligation, agreed to support France against unprovoked German aggression.¹ British delegates alone signed this treaty, and while its terms implied that it bound the empire, it was expressly laid down that it imposed no obligations on the dominions until ratified by the dominion parliament concerned.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 153.

After the signature of the treaty, the imperial government desired that it should be ratified without submission to the parliaments of the empire. Sir Robert Borden emphatically protested by telegram to a course which would have lowered Canada's status and placed it in an inferior position to that of the United Kingdom. As a consequence, the Canadian parliament approved the treaty by motion in favour of ratification, and the ratification of the British empire was not deposited by the foreign secretary until similar motions had been passed by the parliaments of the other dominions. On the other hand, it is important to notice that in all the proceedings the empire's unity was guarded. The Canadian plenipotentiaries were nominated and authorized to act for Canada by the Canadian government, but the full and formal powers to sign were received from the king acting on the advice of the imperial foreign secretary, on whose advice also was signified the ratification of the crown for the whole empire.

The covenant of the league of nations is perhaps the most remarkable recognition of Canada's constitutional development.² Canada is included as an original member of the league in its own right, possessing a vote in the assembly of the league and the right to be represented there by not more than three delegates, in the same manner as the British empire.¹ The latter eo nomine is also entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers to permanent membership of the council of the league and to have one representative at its meetings. The assembly is, however, entitled to select from time to time four other members of the league who should vote in the council. On the suggestion of Sir Robert Borden an express and special declaration was signed by Mr. Lloyd George, President Wilson, and M. Clemenceau which made it clear that a representative of a self-governing dominion could be selected and named as a member of the council. In other respects the interpretation of the covenant of the league is somewhat difficult. The peace conference recognized the empire as a unit; but the covenant appears to say that the dominions guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of one another and of the British empire and India, and that if one of them resorted to war in disregard of covenanted obligations it would be considered as having committed an act of war against the other members of the league, which would then be under obligations to apply to it commercial, if not military and naval pressure. A strict construction might create a situation when the imperial unity of the peace conference would be broken and a dominion bound to assume an attitude of active hostility to the United Kingdom and vice versa. It is, however, possible to get out of the dilemma by falling back on the proviso that 'nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements . . . for securing the maintenance of peace', and it is open to contend that the measures of constraint contemplated are applicable only to sovereign states of 'existing political independence'. The ambiguities are unfortunate; but the creation of a league at a moment when the British empire was undergoing constitutional changes did not make for clearness of expression or for rigidly legal or correct terms.

¹ Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 221.

² Canadian Sessional Papers, No. 41 h (1919).

¹ The covenant of the league recognizes that each member has 'nationals' of its own. As a consequence 'Canadian nationals' were defined by a federal Act in 1921 (11 & 12 George V, c. 4). The status of 'Canadian nationals' as British subjects is not touched. Certain British subjects are merely declared to have a status as 'Canadian nationals'.

On the other hand, the entire conception of treaty and league was not received in Canada without disapproval. The liberal opposition raised strong objections and disclosed quite a different conception of the empire from that taken by the Canadian delegates at the peace conference.¹ They claimed that all that had been done was purely formal and meaningless. Canada was not and could not be a state under the British North America Act, and to seek representation in the matter of treaties and foreign affairs was not only undesirable but unnecessary. Canada could act if occasions arose when Canada was specially affected or concerned. The covenant of the league also came in for severe attacks. It imposed on Canada obligations to enter European disputes, to maintain armed forces to carry out its covenanted duties, even to enter war against the mother country. The old status, pleasing alike to Macdonald and to Laurier, was preferable, when Canada had enjoyed full autonomy, including the right to decide whether or not aid would be forthcoming in imperial wars. Mr. Fielding proposed an amendment to the motion for approval of the treaty pledging the Canadian parliament to the pre-war status. In reply the minister of justice elaborated a new and interesting political theory. He maintained that there was no necessity for Canada to go hat in hand either to the mother country or to any power to obtain nationhood. Neither imperial law nor international recognition could confer what Canada then possessed as a fact. Canada's signature was necessary to the treaty because it was a nation making with other possessions of the crown the British empire. He believed that the covenant of the league did not impose any treaty obligations on Canada.

¹ House of Commons Debates, September 2, 1919.

The speech need not be examined in detail. It is only necessary to point out that whatever the international status of Canada, it is derived from international recognition, and if there is any meaning in words the covenant does impose obligations of a serious nature on Canada, which it had not before the war. The most interesting defence of the diplomatic events since 1914 was made by Mr. Rowell in the house of commons on March 11, 1920. He declared that Canada stood for the precise observance of the rights which it claimed and had succeeded in obtaining, and that Canada awaited a constitutional conference to perfect the developments.

It is idle to argue the issues. Legalists have law on their side. Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Rowell have sentiment and, what is perhaps more valuable, they are training their countrymen in political thinking. The former has perhaps stated the exact constitutional situation as it is to-day better than any one else: 'For each of the Britannic nations, there is but one crown, acting in each dominion and in every province or state upon the advice of ministers responsible to the people and invested with their mandate. Thus throughout the empire there is created a direct and perfect relationship between the crown and the people. . . . Equality of nationhood must be recognized, preserving unimpaired to each dominion the full autonomous powers which it now holds, and safeguarding to each, by necessary consultation and by adequate voice and influence, its highest interests in the issues of war and peace. For each nation complete control in its own affairs; for the whole empire necessary co-operation according to the will of the people, in all matters of common concern.'¹ If this speech means anything it means this—that the empire is not in process of dissolution into a group of allied Britannic states. What is claimed is absolute and complete autonomy in Canada, and beyond Canada co-operation and consultation in foreign affairs. There can be little doubt that those conditions practically exist under an imperial tie, which must itself receive adequate and objective treatment. It is well also to point out that during the Canadian federal election campaign at the close of 1921 the constitution of the empire was never seriously or fully discussed. Whatever advances individual Canadian statesmen may have made in seeing apparent anomalies and in desiring to rectify them by new legal and constitutional forms, none of them has been willing to emphasize the issues at a general election. The motives behind such unwillingness may belong to Canadian party politics. On the other hand, the absence of deliberate discussion is in itself evidence that in Canada there is no widespread demand for change. There is a wide emotional consciousness that Canada does not stand exactly where it did in 1914, but it would be apparently impossible at present to organize that emotion into anything like a general demand for constitutional reconstructions.

¹ During Ottawa's welcome to the Prince of Wales, August 29, 1919.

[AUTHORITIES.—The leading authority is Professor A. Berriedale Keith. His Responsible Government in the Dominions (3 vols., Oxford, 1912), Imperial Unity and the Dominions (Oxford, 1916), and War Government in the Dominions (Oxford, 1921) are works of primary importance. Articles by the same writer in the Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation, vol. xvi, pp. 199 ff.; vol. xviii, pp. 47 ff.; Journal of Comparative Legislation and International Law, vol. i, pp. 7 ff.; vol. ii, pp. 112 ff., 328 ff.; and in the Canadian Law Times, vol. xxxvi, pp. 831 ff.; vol. xxxviii, pp. 695 ff., should be consulted. A critical examination of most of the books, pamphlets, and review articles can be found in the Review of Historical Publications relating to Canada (ed. G. M. Wrong, H. H. Langton, W. S. Wallace, 22 vols., Toronto, 1897–1919), and in the Canadian Historical Review (Toronto, 1920 [in progress]). The Minutes and Proceedings of the Colonial and Imperial Conferences (1894–1921) are valuable, especially those for 1911, 1917, 1918, and 1921. The Reports of the War Cabinet, 1917 and 1918, are of special importance. The various treaties and the covenant of the league of nations are essential. H. Duncan Hall, The British Commonwealth of Nations (London, 1920), is a good modern study and should be read in close connexion with Lionel Curtis, The Problem of the Commonwealth (London, 1916). The articles dealing with Canada and the empire in The Round Table (London, 1914–21) are full of interest. Sir Robert Borden, Addresses on Canada at War (Ottawa, 1918), The War and the Future (London, 1917), Canadian Constitutional Studies (Toronto, 1922), are of value owing to their author's position at the time when important developments were taking place. G. B. Adams, The British Empire and a League of Peace (London, 1919), is a consideration of the empire in relation to wider issues. The writings of Mr. J. S. Ewart and M. Henri Bourassa should not be overlooked, and the leading articles in Le Devoir (Montreal, 1914-21) will repay study. W. S. Wallace, 'The Growth of Canadian National Feeling' (Canadian Historical Review, vol. i, pp. 136 ff.), is an excellent introduction to the history of the growth of Canadian constitutional consciousness. In the New Statesman (Feb. 8, 1919) and the Contemporary Review (July 1921) I have attempted to sum up Canadian public opinion on the issues. The standard biographies continue of value, especially O. D. Skelton, Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier (2 vols., Oxford, 1921). R. A. Eastwood, The Organization of a Britannic Partnership (London and Manchester, 1922), contains an excellent study of developments and sober and judicious conclusions.]

CHAPTER XXII

THE FRAMEWORK AND SCHEME OF GOVERNMENT

THE constitution of Canada is partly written and partly unwritten. The unwritten constitution includes all the great landmarks in British history in so far as they are working principles—Magna Carta, the Petition of Right, the Bill of Rights, the Habeas Corpus Acts, the Act of Settlement—as well as the generally recognized conventions and usages. The written constitution is found in a series of Acts known and quoted as the British North America Acts, 1867–1915.¹ A general consideration of these Acts in their terms and workings is the best introduction to the scheme of Canadian government.

Executive authority is vested in the crown, and is exercised in the federal sphere by a governor-general, and in the provincial spheres by lieutenant-governors. Legislative power for the dominion is entrusted to a bi-cameral parliament consisting of a senate and a house of commons. Legislative power in the dominion is distributed between the federal and the provincial legislatures. To the former is given a general power, and an exclusive authority to deal with twenty-nine enumerated subjects ; to the latter are assigned sixteen enumerated subjects on which they have exclusive power to legislate. By a special clause they possess sole power over education. Concurrent legislative authority exists over agriculture and immigration.²

When an Act is passed by the federal government the governor-general may assent to it, he may withhold assent, or he may reserve it for the consideration of the imperial government, which may in addition disallow within two years any Act to which assent has been given. In the provinces the lieutenant-governors are guided by the same regulation, but the power of disallowance belongs to the dominion and will be discussed later.

¹ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 694 ff. The British North America Act of 1867 is in the Appendix, pp. 459 ff.

² For the distribution of legislative power, see chapter xxiv.

The judges of the superior, district, and county courts in each province are appointed by the governor-general, except those of the courts of probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. They hold office during good behaviour and are removable by the governor-general on address from the parliament of Canada.

With this general scheme in mind it is possible to examine more closely the great divisions of the constitution: (a) The crown in Canada; (b) The federal and provincial executives; (c) the federal and provincial parliaments; (d) the judicature; (e) the legislative power in Canada. The first four can be considered in relation to the general scheme, the last requires separate and fuller treatment.

The imperial crown is one and indivisible and is not broken up between the British Isles, the dominions, and the rest of the empire. Whatever the constitutional rights of the crown they can be exercised in Canada, but through responsible ministers, as this is the method by which these rights find expression wherever responsible government exists under the crown. The imperial power to veto a dominion Act is an interesting illustration of the unity of the crown. It is true that consultation and amicable workings between Ottawa and London have made this veto of little actual importance in Canadian history, and that, since equality of status has been claimed for and conceded to Canada, the right has been practically abandoned by the imperial government, yet its existence even as a theory may be noted in this connexion. All laws, whether federal or provincial, are enacted by the king in parliament. The governor-general, who is appointed by the king on advice, represents the crown in federal government. A convention has grown up in relation to his appointment. No governor-general is sent to Canada without consultation with and approval by the Canadian government.¹ His official acts are 'with the advice of the privy council for Canada'. This enactment is rather vague, as the privy council in Canada is purely an honorary body. But, as has been pointed out, the conventions of the constitution apply to Canada, and although there is no express mention of responsible government in the written constitution, the governor-general acts on the advice of his ministers. On the other hand, he is not a viceroy. His authority is limited by his instructions or by statute, and he cannot exercise other powers of the crown unless they are legally delegated to him. The changes before 1914 in connexion with his office have been considered. Since that date there have been developments. The new method of communication between the imperial and Canadian governments has resulted in robbing him of his ambassadorial functions, and his duties are at present confined to those of the constitutional head of a state. He is the visible link between the United Kingdom and Canada, and his office emphasizes the unity of the crown within the empire.² He represents the king, not the British government or the colonial office. The crown is represented for the purposes of provincial government by a lieutenant-governor in each province. He is appointed by the governor-general in council, but, as will appear later, he exercises all the functions of the crown necessary for provincial government and is no mere creature of the federal executive. His position or constitutional functions cannot be altered by any Act, federal or provincial.

¹ Macdonald apparently disapproved of this convention: Macdonald to Stanley, December 6, 1888. On the other hand, the Marquis of Lorne when governor-general told Macdonald that he was all in favour of it: Lorne to Macdonald, May 16, 1883. Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, pp. 300, 433.

² 'The administration of public affairs is conducted by ministers responsible to parliament and the governor-general acts by their advice. By convention, his appointment is subject to the approval of the government of the day, and his functions as an imperial officer are formal rather than real: his office as representative of the crown exhibits the constitutional unity of the empire. . . . He has become in fact a nominated president': R. L. Borden, Canadian Constitutional Studies, pp. 61, 93.

The executive government of the dominion is carried on by a cabinet of ministers selected from the political party in power. Appointments are made by the governor-general on the recommendation of the premier. Ministers in charge of a department are paid a salary, but a minister without portfolio receives no remuneration. While a premier has all his supporters from whom to choose his colleagues, yet almost a class of conventions has grown up in connexion with the formation of a federal cabinet. The interests of Quebec generally and of the English-speaking Canadians in that province particularly must be considered. Then the Roman catholics in other provinces than Quebec must not be overlooked. Some effort, too, must be made to give to the cabinet as balanced a representation as possible of the various constituent provinces in the federation.¹ Every cabinet minister who sits in the house of commons must seek re-election on accepting a paid portfolio.

As soon as a cabinet has taken the oaths of office they act with the governor-general as the executive government of Canada. They are responsible for all orders in council, for the finance bill, for all government measures. All arrangements for the administration of Canada are made at cabinet meetings, and in so far as these are accepted and acknowledged as government measures the cabinet acts as a unit and must stand or fall as such. A member who cannot support his colleagues in these matters once they are before parliament usually resigns according to constitutional convention. He has the privilege of explaining his resignation in parliament, and his first statement must be made there so that the premier can reply. The governor-general's permission is necessary for exercising the privilege, as proceedings in the cabinet cannot be made public without his leave first obtained ; but such permission is never refused. It is the duty of a cabinet minister to see to the efficient working of his department. He must attend to the drafting of all bills in which his department is concerned and pilot them through parliament as far as possible. He must take an active interest in his departmental estimates and defend them when challenged. In addition, he must be prepared not only to support his own administration but that of the cabinet as a whole within and without the legislature, and to receive deputations dealing with matters within his departmental sphere.

¹ See pp. 317-18, 413-14, and compare Macdonald to J. A. Chapleau, June 6, 1888: 'The time has come, I think, when we must choose men for their qualifications rather than for their locality' (Pope, op. cit., p. 414). See also Report of the Special Committee on the Machinery of Government in Canada (1919), pp. 8 ff., and the present premier's memorandum on his choice of ministers: 'In the formation of the government I have aimed above all else at national unity. This end I have felt would be served, and the federal spirit of our constitution most acceptably recognized, by according representation in the cabinet, so far as might be possible, to all the provinces of Canada. . . .' (Toronto Daily Star, December 30, 1921).

The relations between the governor-general and the cabinet are now fairly clear. He does not attend cabinet meetings, but all communications which can be called official come to him through the cabinet, and all orders in council are submitted to him personally. He is entitled to receive the full confidence of his ministers when they ask him to act in any official capacity. If confidence does not exist, he can doubtless dismiss them ; but he would do so with the full knowledge that he would be compelled to find successors who would be prepared to take constitutional responsibility for his action. As a matter of fact no instance of dismissal exists in the history of federal government in Canada.¹ Doubtless also he has the constitutional power to refuse a dissolution, but the sense of political responsibility has become so strong with Canada's new status in the empire that to do so would be an act of extreme danger. The tendency is to assimilate the constitutional conventions of Great Britain and to follow in this matter the completeness of political development.

¹ See, however, an interesting account in Tupper's Recollections of Sixty Years (pp. 156 ff.) of an episode in connexion with the fall of Macdonald's ministry in 1873, when the governor-general, Lord Dufferin, asked Macdonald to resign and only recalled his decision on Tupper's pointing out that the action would make Dufferin ' the head of the liberal party '.

In provincial government the executives are modelled on the British type and follow the lines of cabinet administration. The functions of the provincial cabinets, the theories and conventions governing them, and the relationship between the executives and the lieutenant-governors are so similar to those in the federal sphere that they do not call for separate treatment. It is, however, interesting to note that there are instances of dismissal, and that lieutenant-governors have forced their advisors to appoint commissions to inquire into provincial affairs, which have resulted either in resignation or in defeat at the polls.¹ On the other hand, it must be remembered that in some respects there is an important difference between a lieutenant-governor acting in this manner and a governor-general. The latter in such cases has very direct responsibility, and his actions are governed by conventions now fully accepted, while the former is responsible in this connexion to the governor-general in council, who may remove him from office on the advice of the federal cabinet. In two cases lieutenant-governors have been recalled because the dominion government considered that they had not carried out the rules of responsible government.²

The parliament of Canada is bi-cameral, consisting of a senate and a house of commons. After serious debate the senate was created as a nominated house, and members are appointed by the governor-general, which, of course, means by the federal cabinet.¹ The senate does not represent provinces as such, but appointments are made in such a way as to represent groups of provinces. At present it consists of ninety-six members distributed as follows: Ontario, 24; Quebec, 24; the Maritime Provinces and Prince Edward Island, 24 (Nova Scotia, 10; New Brunswick, 10; Prince Edward Island, 4); the Western Provinces, 24, six each. Senators from Quebec alone represent senatorial divisions. In the event of a deadlock between the senate and the house of commons the governor-general can recommend the crown to add from four to eight members.² This enactment appears to make the imperial cabinet directly responsible. It is, however, more than likely that, under Canada's present status, the crown's authority would be purely formal if the recommendation were made. At any rate it is certain that the governor-general must recommend if he is desired to do so by his cabinet.

¹ See Canada Sessional Papers, (1891) No. 86, (1892) No. 88, for a case in Quebec, and Canadian Annual Review (1903), pp. 213 ff., for a case in British Columbia.

² See Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 2445, for the case of Letellier de St. Just in Quebec, and Canada Sessional Papers (1900), No. 174, for the case of McInnes in British Columbia.

A senator must be at least thirty years of age and a natural-born or naturalized subject of the crown. He must possess freehold valued at four thousand dollars in the province for which he is appointed, and real and personal property worth four thousand dollars over his debts and liabilities. He must reside in the province for which he is appointed, and in the case of Quebec his residence or real property qualification must be in the electoral division for which he is chosen. He holds office for life, but he may resign at any time, and his place becomes vacant if he fails in any of the general conditions governing his appointment, if he is absent for two consecutive sessions, if he ceases in any way to be a subject of the crown, if he becomes insolvent, a public defaulter, or is convicted of any great crime.

¹ See below, pp. 412-13. An official opinion of the federal minister of justice has laid it down that no woman senators can be created without an amendment of the B.N.A. Act, 1867 (March 23, 1922).

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 706 ff. (5 & 6 George V, c. 45 (1915)). The original provision was added to the British North America Act, 1867, at the suggestion of the imperial government. There is only one instance of a Canadian cabinet asking for its application. The Mackenzie ministry, on taking office in 1873 on the defeat of Macdonald's first ministry, asked that the crown should be advised to add six members. The governor-general forwarded the request to the colonial secretary, who firmly refused it, stating that the power was only for use in serious deadlock which actually held up the administration, and when it could be shown that it provided adequate remedy: Canada Sessional Papers (1877), No. 68; cf. Senate Journals (1877), pp. 130, 174.

There is no obligation for a cabinet to be represented by a minister in the senate, but the government in power always has a leader there who explains and guides government policy. There is also a leader elected by the party in opposition. There is only one provision limiting the power of the senate with regard either to finance or to general legislation. It cannot originate any money bill. Theoretically it may reject a finance bill, but can make no amendments to it. The speaker is appointed by the governor-general and may be removed by him. Fifteen senators form a quorum, including the speaker, who always has a vote. Decisions rest with the majority, an equal division of votes, however, being considered a negative.

The number of members of the house of commons varies according to redistribution bills after every decennial census. Redistribution is governed by a statutory constitutional principle. The representation of Quebec is fixed at sixty-five members, and each province is assigned 'such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained by the census) as the number sixty-five bears to the population of Quebec so ascertained'.¹ No qualifications for membership were laid down in 1867. At present 'any British subject, male or female, who is of the full age of twenty-one, may be a candidate at a dominion election'. Those guilty of corrupt and illegal practices, government contractors, holders of certain public offices, persons in the paid employment of the government, and members of the provincial legislatures are ineligible. Legislation exempts from these disabilities ministers of the crown, members of the military, naval, or air forces on active service, shareholders in companies having government contracts other than for building public works, and militia officers or militia men receiving no emolument from the public purse other than those prescribed by legislation governing the militia.¹ All members receive an indemnity for their services and are allowed their travelling expenses.

¹ British North America Act, 1867, s. 51. See speeches by Laurier and Sir Robert Borden on this principle, House of Commons Debates, March 31, 1903, February 10, 1914.

The electoral districts or ridings are determined by the federal parliament. In the Quebec resolutions this power was left to the provincial legislatures.² Macdonald, however, noted this as 'an obvious blunder' and a 'mistake'.³ It was rectified at the Westminster conference.⁴ It appeared as a federal power in all drafts of the British North America Act, and was finally embodied in the constitution of 1867.⁵ For many years it was a source of bitter controversy, as gerrymandering the constituencies by means of a straight party vote went on on a considerable scale. In 1893 the liberal convention at Ottawa committed the party to non-partisan redistribution.⁶ In 1903 this pledge was redeemed. Laurier in introducing a redistribution bill added no electoral schedules. He promised, if the opposition would accept the measure, to refer it after the second reading to a special committee composed of seven members, on which the opposition would be represented by three selected by themselves.⁷ In 1914 Sir Robert Borden brought in necessary legislation and followed the plan adopted in 1903.⁸ Both parties have accepted the principle of a larger unit for urban than for rural ridings.

¹ 10 & 11 George V, c. 46 (July 1, 1920), ss. 38, 39.

² Pope, Confederation Documents, p. 42.

³ Macdonald to Tupper, November 14, 1864, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, pp. 14 ff.

⁴ Pope, Confederation Documents, p. 127.

⁵ Ibid., pp. 141 ff.

⁶ Report of the Ottawa Liberal Convention, p. 129.

⁷ House of Commons Debates, March 31, 1903.

⁸ Ibid., February 10, 1914.

The history of the dominion franchise is interesting. The power to determine it was left to the federal parliament, but until exercised it was provided that the electoral laws of the provinces should hold good in this connexion in the federal area. When the Act of 1867 was passed Algoma was a territory, and it was laid down that the franchise should be given in it to every male householder of full age. On the other hand, in the five general elections held between 1867 and 1882 members of the house of commons were elected on the provincial franchises. Macdonald never liked this method. 'It is impossible', he wrote, 'that the elective franchise should be at the mercy of a foreign body.'¹ Before 1885 he introduced several abortive bills establishing a dominion franchise. In that year he succeeded in carrying a measure creating a federal franchise based on property. Of the seven provinces which composed Canada in 1885, all except Quebec and Nova Scotia had introduced by legislation manhood suffrage. Macdonald, however, objected to this principle. In addition he stated that it was contrary to first principles that the members of the federal parliament 'representing the people in a dominion sense' should not have control of all reforms and changes in representation. He objected to the provincial laws as wilfully partisan which excluded men on the pay roll of the federal government from the franchise.² Uniformity and the desire to enfranchise the servants of the dominion were thus emphasized as the reasons for change. The liberals attacked the measure from other angles. Firstly, they considered that appointments under the Act would add considerably to the government's patronage and open up possibilities of abuse. Secondly, the Act called for enormous expenditure in annual revisions. The government, indeed, was forced to pass legislation suspending the clauses making these revisions compulsory. Thus another grievance was added, as many 'young voters entitled to the franchise had in numerous instances been prevented from exercising their natural rights'. Thirdly, the franchise was less liberal than that which existed in most of the provinces.¹ When the liberals came into power they reverted to the older plan, but care was taken that no one, otherwise qualified as an elector, should be disqualified from voting at a federal election because of employment in the federal or provincial public service.

¹ Macdonald to Brown Chamberlin, October 26, 1868, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, p. 75.

² See his speech, House of Commons Debates, April 16, 1885.

Under dominion legislation the provincial voters lists are now used. All British subjects by birth or naturalization, irrespective of sex, of full age, and not being Indians ordinarily resident on an Indian reservation, are qualified to vote. They must have resided in Canada twelve months, and in the electoral division where they seek to vote two months immediately preceding the issue of the writ of election. Indians fulfilling these conditions who have served with the Canadian forces are enfranchised. Judges appointed by the governor in council, the chief electoral officer of the dominion, persons disfranchised for corrupt and illegal practices, criminal prisoners, inmates of asylums and public charitable institutions, persons disqualified in provincial elections on account of race except those who served in the late war with the Canadian forces, returning officers—except in case of an equality of votes—and election clerks are disqualified.²

Every house of commons can continue for five years and no longer unless previously dissolved by the governor-general acting on ministerial advice. The arrangements for a new election are in the hands of the chief electoral officer, who acts in each riding through a returning officer. In addition to the general oversight of an election, the latter is responsible for seeing that candidates have consented to nomination and have made deposits of two hundred dollars each. All official election expenses are a charge on the dominion. The deposit is returned to the successful candidate, while his opponents forfeit theirs unless they obtain a number of votes equal to one-half the number of votes polled in favour of the candidate elected.¹

¹ Report of Ottawa Liberal Convention, p. 122.

² 10 & 11 George V, c. 46, ss. 29, 30, 31, 32 (Dominion Elections Act, 1920).

The proceedings of the house of commons are governed partly by the constitution and partly by rules or customs based on British precedents. The former provides that the commons can elect their own speaker, who shall not vote unless on a tie, that the presence of twenty members including the speaker shall form a quorum, that a member can address the house in English or in French,² and that a majority of voices shall decide a motion. The latter cover the convention that the speaker elected must be approved by the crown. To them can also be assigned the custom of the speaker's demand for 'the ancient and undoubted rights and privileges of the commons' and the assertion of the independence of the house by reading a dummy bill, which has no reference to the cause of summons in the royal proclamation convening parliament or to the business to which parliament's attention is drawn in the speech from the throne. Local usages have grown up in relation to the offices of speaker and deputy-speaker. It is practically a working principle that, when a political party holds office during several parliaments, if the speaker in one parliament is of British origin, the next one shall be a French-Canadian. By a regulation of the house, the speaker and the deputy-speaker cannot be of the same race. Indeed, appointments to all offices, great and small, both in the senate and in the house of commons, are made as a rule in relation to racial differences. There is also an innovation at Ottawa which is a marked departure from British custom. The leader of the opposition, who has been elected by his party, holds an office known to law and is paid a statutory salary in addition to his sessional indemnity.¹

¹ Ibid., s. 40.

² Under the British North America Act of 1867 French or English may be used in the parliaments of Canada and of Quebec; the records and journals of these must be printed in both languages, and either may be used in any court established under the Act or in the courts of Quebec. Under this enactment the Acts of Canada and Quebec are printed in both languages as well as all papers, &c., issued by the dominion parliament. The same provision was inserted in the Act creating Manitoba (38 Victoria, c. 3, s. 23, Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 689 ff.), but was repealed by provincial legislation in 1890 (53 Victoria, c. 14).

Only two of the provincial parliaments are bi-cameral—those of Nova Scotia and Quebec. The legislative council of Nova Scotia consists of twenty-one members nominated by the lieutenant-governor in council, and holding office during pleasure. No one can be a member who sits in the federal parliament or holds certain provincial offices, or who is legally declared to be disqualified under the laws of Canada for membership of the federal house of commons. Absence for two sessions without the consent of the lieutenant-governor in council vacates a seat. The federal rules in relation to finance bills govern procedure. The legislative council of Quebec consists of twenty-four members holding office for life and appointed by the lieutenant-governor by instrument under the great seal of the province. Each member represents one of the twenty-four divisions of the province. The regulations governing qualifications and legislation are similar to those relating to the senate of Canada. In neither province is there any provision for deadlock, or for the adjustment of differences between the two chambers. The dominion government could not interfere. On two occasions when difficulties arose in Nova Scotia, the colonial office refused to recommend imperial legislation as the province possessed the right to change its constitution.² In 1890 the government of the same province attempted to abolish the upper house, and failing in this object they only appointed members who gave a pledge to consent to the abolition. These members supported government measures, but developed scruples about their consent to their own destruction. In Ontario and British Columbia no second chamber has ever existed. In New Brunswick it was abolished by the method tried in Nova Scotia, an Act being passed bringing it to an end at the close of the session of 1892.¹ In Prince Edward Island the upper house was elective from 1862 onwards. In 1893 it was abolished under a local Act, or rather it was merged in the assembly. Part of the members of the one assembly are elected on a property franchise and part on adult suffrage.² Manitoba was organized as a province with a bicameral legislature, the upper house consisting of a limited number of nominated members. It was abolished in 1876.³ The new provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, were created with a single chamber only.

¹ Revised Statutes of Canada (1906), c. 10.

² Cf. dispatch from Lord Ripon, December 3, 1894, House of Assembly Journals, Nova Scotia (1894), Appendix No. 17.

It would be impossible to examine in detail the composition and procedure connected with the nine provincial houses of assembly. In most provinces adult suffrage prevails. In Nova Scotia and Quebec there are small property, income, or rental qualifications. The disqualifications for voting are analogous to those obtaining at federal elections, but in Manitoba there are certain literary qualifications, and in Saskatchewan and British Columbia there are racial disqualifications. The rules governing membership of the provincial assemblies are on the whole similar. In addition to the common disqualifications, no one who is a member of the dominion parliament or of another legislative assembly can sit, and clergymen are ineligible in Prince Edward Island. Members are paid in all the provinces. A provincial legislature has the exclusive power to alter the constitution of the province, but this power does not extend to the office of lieutenant-governor because he represents the crown. On the other hand, a provincial legislature may increase the powers and duties germane to the office.¹ The general power, outside this limitation, is not free from obscurities. It cannot be exercised in the widest sense, otherwise it might be used to destroy the federation.² It would also appear that a province has not the power to legislate by the initiative and referendum. 'Legislature', as used in the British North America Act of 1867, connotes a representative house, and the power granted to a province of amending its constitution does not include such an absolute change in the provincial constitution as would destroy the nature of the legislature and give the legislative power to those possessed of the provincial franchise who are not a 'legislature' within the meaning of the constitution.³ The privy council raised more technical objections, as such proceedings appeared to affect vitally the office of lieutenant-governor.⁴

¹ 54 Victoria, c. 9 (New Brunswick).

² 56 Victoria, c. 21 (Prince Edward Island).

³ 39 Victoria, c. 28 (Manitoba).

The privileges of the Canadian legislatures are on a clear foundation. The extraordinary privileges of the British house of commons are part of the lex et consuetudo parliamenti, and can only be claimed by Canadian legislatures under statutory enactment. When this legislation validly takes place there is no ambiguity. The privileges of the dominion parliament are governed by the British North America Acts of 1867 and of 1875,⁵ the latter of which gives the Canadian parliament power

¹ Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario (1890), 20 Ontario Reports, 222.

² Cf. Ramsay J. in ex parte Dansereau, 19 L. C. J. 210, 224-5.

³ Re Initiative and Referendum Act, 1916, 27 Manitoba Law Reports, 1.

⁴ Re Manitoba Initiative and Referendum Act, [1919] A. C. 935 ; 35 Times Law Reports, pp. 630 ff.

⁵ Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 667, 695. The Act of 1875 was passed because in 1868 and in 1873 dominion legislation had conferred powers on committees to examine witnesses on oath, a privilege not possessed by the imperial parliament in 1867 (Canada Sessional Papers, 1876, No. 45).

to bring its practice into line with contemporary practice in the British parliament. In the provinces after federation legislation conferring privileges met with varying success at the hands of the dominion cabinet. There was a tendency for the minister of justice to consider such legislation ultra vires, but there was no consistency of treatment. The matter was finally settled in 1896, when the judicial committee of the privy council laid it down that, as the powers of the legislatures at federation were continued, among which was full authority to enact such laws as they pleased on the subject of their privileges, provincial legislation in this connexion was valid. They also held that the power was competent under the constitutional authority granted the provinces to change their constitution.¹ All the provinces have laid down their parliamentary privileges by legislation, which is now beyond dispute.

Canada does not possess a system of federal courts such as exists in the United States. The constitution, however, makes provision for the creation of such a system by the parliament of the dominion. The provinces have exclusive power to constitute and to organize courts for provincial purposes of both civil and criminal jurisdiction. The provincial legislatures can regulate the procedure in civil matters. The dominion parliament may impose new duties upon existing provincial courts, and may give them new powers in the matter of subjects not assigned exclusively to the provinces. The constitution provides that the judges of the superior, district, and county courts in the provinces must be paid by the dominion, and their appointment must lie with the governor-general, subject to certain regulations connected with the provincial bars and to the exclusion of the probate courts of the Maritime Provinces.²

¹ Fielding v. Thomas, [1896] A. C. 600.

² There has been much irritation between the dominion and the provinces owing to attempts by the latter to regulate certain judicial appointments. See inter alia an important report of Sir John Thompson in Provincial Legislation, 1867-95, p. 538 and in Lefroy, Legislative Power in Canada, pp. 140 ff.

The provincial courts deal with all matters of litigation under federal and provincial law. They also hear election petitions and have jurisdiction in cases of controverted elections. They have also imposed on them the duty of giving opinions on the constitutionality of Acts for the guidance of the provincial executives, and from these opinions no appeal lies to the supreme court of Canada, not even by provincial legislation.¹ Criminal law and criminal procedure are controlled exclusively by the federal government.

The tenure of judicial office is regulated by law. The judges of the superior courts hold office during good behaviour, and they can only be removed by the governor-general on address of the senate and house of commons.² Their salaries do not depend on annual votes, but are placed on the civil list. The same terms of tenure are applied to judges of the supreme court by Canadian legislation.³ County court judges hold office during good behaviour and residence in their respective jurisdictions. The governor-general in council can, however, remove them for misdemeanours, incapacity, failure in the performance of duty owing to age, ill health, or any other cause. The circumstances leading up to a possible removal must be fully inquired into after due notice given to the judge concerned, who must be afforded an opportunity to be heard, to cross-examine witnesses, and to bring in evidence on his own behalf. If he is removed, the order in council covering such removal, the correspondence, reports, and evidence, must be laid before parliament within the first fifteen days of the next session.⁴

There are only two federal courts in Canada—the supreme court and the court of exchequer and admiralty. The latter deals with patents, trade-marks, and such-like, and has an original jurisdiction in revenue cases concurrent with the

¹ Union Colliery Company v. Attorney-General for British Columbia, 27 S. C. R. 637. See, however, p. 399, note.

² British North America Act, 1867, ss. 99, 100.

³ Revised Statutes of Canada (1906), c. 139, s. 9.

⁴ Ibid., c. 138, s. 28.

provincial courts, and to it alone belong cases against the crown and petitions of right in the federal area. The former consists of a chief justice and five puisne judges, and possesses an appellate jurisdiction, criminal and civil, throughout Canada. There is no court of criminal appeal similar to that in England, but questions of law arising in a criminal trial may be reserved and brought before the provincial court of appeal, and if that court is not unanimous, the person convicted may appeal to the supreme court of Canada. In civil cases an appeal lies, generally speaking, to the supreme court from all final judgements of the highest courts of final resort. This appellate jurisdiction varies in connexion with different provinces and is governed by federal legislation. The federal parliament has the power to allow appeals to the supreme court from provincial judgements and courts even though such judgements are not final and such courts not courts of final resort.¹ Provincial legislation cannot interfere with the jurisdiction granted by federal legislation to the supreme court. No province can prevent appeals in all cases from the provincial courts, if the federal parliament has not itself limited the right of appeal.² Nor can a provincial legislature grant powers of appeal where such are limited by federal authority. The supreme court has also an appellate jurisdiction in cases of controverted elections, and from its decisions in such cases the privy council will not receive appeals.³ The governor-general in council has the power to obtain opinions by direct answers from the supreme court on any question of law or fact. The answers are not binding on the governor-general in council, nor on Canadian judges in any specific cases, but they are treated as final judgements for purposes of reference to the privy council.

An anomalous situation exists in connexion with divorce. At

¹ L'Association St. Jean-Baptiste de Montréal v. Brault, 31 S. C. R. 172. Cf. Revised Statutes (1906), c. 139, ss. 38, 40.

² Crown Grain Company Limited v. Day, [1908] A. C. 504.

³ Thérberge v. Laudry, 2 App. Cas. 102.

federation the exclusive right of legislating in matters of divorce was conferred on the federal parliament, but the powers to grant divorce already belonging to certain of the provinces were not abrogated. As a consequence, the courts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and British Columbia continued to possess such jurisdiction, being already vested with it before entering federation.¹ There was a general opinion that none of the other provinces possessed such rights. In order to destroy inequalities it seemed reasonable that the federal legislature should create uniformity. Quebec, however, proved hostile, and as no government appeared anxious to create a situation which would antagonize that province when there was another way out, the plan was adopted of granting divorces by federal legislation. The senate investigates applications and the house of commons accepts their decisions as a rule, without however surrendering its rights to review or to reject them. Recently this arrangement has received a rude shock. It now appears that the courts of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan possess a jurisdiction in divorce.² There thus arises the curious situation that citizens of Quebec, Ontario, and possibly Prince Edward Island³ who wish to begin divorce proceedings must resort to the cumbersome and expensive method of federal legislation. In a recent debate on a private member's bill, the late government approved the suggestion of a regular federal system of divorce. The approval is interesting, as Quebec would undoubtedly oppose legislation. It might be possible for the federal parliament to exclude Quebec from the scope of such a system, as it would appear constitutional to pass a locally restricted dominion law.¹ However, even if Quebec abstained from opposing such a measure, those citizens of Quebec who did not accept the general principles governing Quebec's antagonism would be left under severe disabilities. At present there seems no available solution to the difficulties.

¹ For the settling of doubts concerning British Columbia, see Watts v. Attorney-General for British Columbia, [1908] A. C. 573.

² See Board v. Board, [1919] A. C. 956 ; Walker v. Walker, [1919] A. C. 947.

³ Under a statute of Prince Edward Island, 5 William IV, c. 10 (1836), the lieutenant-governor and council have jurisdiction in all matters of marriage and divorce. The power has long been disused.

The crown has an undoubted prerogative right to hear appeals from the courts of the dominion. Before 1844, a colonial Act could bar that right, but when it became statutory in that year,² it seems clear that the only method of barring it at present is by an Act of the imperial parliament or by a local Act passed with imperial approval. A Canadian Act purports to bar the right in criminal cases.³ It may bar the prerogative, but certainly it cannot bar the statutory right of appeal. Appeals lie direct to the privy council from the supreme court of Canada and from the higher provincial courts. There are no appeals as of right from the supreme court, but an appeal lies in every case by special leave. In the provinces appeals are governed by special leave or are as of right, the latter being regulated by rules laid down in orders in council or in local Acts. In 1909 Ontario proposed to limit appeals both to the supreme court and to the privy council. Appeals as of right to the latter were to disappear, and special leave was only to be granted in constitutional cases and cases of financial or political importance. The attorney-general pointed out that the province could not limit appeals to the supreme court, and that the privy council was not anxious to encourage them to London. The Act passed without the proposed clauses. It would appear that a colonial legislature can constitutionally bar the prerogative right, but not the ¹ 'Divorce' being an enumerated power exclusively granted to the dominion, it seems clear that the dominion could pass a law in relation to it of restricted scope, either on the analogy of special or private bill legislation, or as being for the 'peace, order, and good government of Canada'. See McCuaig and Smith v. Keith, [1878] 4 S. C. R. 648; and A. B. Keith (?) in Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation, vol. xvi, p. 90.

² 7 & 8 Victoria, c. 69 (Judicial Committee Act, 1844).

³ 51 Victoria, c. 43 (Revised Statutes, 1906, c. 146).

statutory right of appeal to the judicial committee under the Act of 1844. In 1920 somewhat similar proposals were mooted, also in Ontario, but were dropped.¹ On the other hand, the privy council is trying to curtail its work in Canadian cases. It has declined to receive criminal appeals, though it has a legal right to receive them, refusing to admit an appeal on behalf of the rioters recently condemned at Winnipeg.² It is hard to form an adequate estimate of Canadian opinion on this matter.³ As an abstract question there is as much to be said for appeals as against them. At the imperial war conference of 1918, Sir Robert Borden ventured to suggest that Canada would like to see appellate courts reduced and that the dominion should decide its own constitutional questions. His ideas were naturally influenced by the growing status of Canada, but how far they had public opinion behind them it is hard to say.⁴ There is a certain implication of inferiority in the perpetuation of the judicial committee as the final court of appeal, and the fact that the high court of Australia has dealt with difficult questions in a manner not unworthy of judicial traditions seems to point to a future when Canada might reasonably hope normally to make its own supreme court supreme in reality. On the other hand, arguments for retention based on the calm aloofness of the committee or on the rights of a British subject to seek justice from the crown are rather unconvincing. The former in the final analysis cast grave aspersions on the whole Canadian judiciary, and the latter recall only the rich corporation and

¹ Keith, Journal of Society of Comparative Legislation, vol. xvi, p. 218.

² Russell v. Rex (The Times, June 22, 1920).

³ See, however, W. E. Raney, 'Nations within the Empire' (Canadian Magazine, February 1921, pp. 291 ff.), and C. H. Tupper, 'The Position of the Privy Council' (Journal of Comparative Legislation, 3rd series, vol. iii, pt. iv). The benchers of the Law Society of Upper Canada interviewed the attorney-general for Ontario (W. E. Raney) on March 8, 1922, to protest against a proposed measure limiting appeals (Toronto Star, March 8, 1922).

⁴ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 9177. In 1919 Lord Haldane remarked that even in topics affecting the constitution it was desirable that they should come before the supreme court of Canada before being brought to London for argument (Manitoba Initiative and Referendum Case).

forget the penurious suitor. It has been suggested that the peculiar privileges of Quebec within the federation make the right of appeal an excellent safeguard against racial strife and passion. In South Africa, however, there is much opportunity for similar eventualities, and while there is a constitutional right of appeal from the appellate division of the supreme court, the privy council has laid down the principle that only in cases of the greatest moment will it entertain appeals.¹ The right has thus assumed only theoretical importance. Whatever the future in Canada, it must not be forgotten that the judicial committee has given the Canadian constitution its most abiding forms.

[AUTHORITIES.—A. B. Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions (3 vols., Oxford, 1912); Imperial Unity and the Dominions (Oxford, 1916); Dominion Home Rule in Practice (Oxford, 1921); Selected Speeches and Documents on British Colonial Policy, 1763–1917 (Oxford, 1918) are standard authorities. The British North America Acts, 1867–1915, are in Kennedy, Documents of the Canadian Constitution, 1759–1915 (Oxford, 1918). For legal interpretations see A. H. F. Lefroy, Legislative Power in Canada (Toronto, 1898); Canada's Federal System (Toronto, 1913); A Short Treatise on Canadian Constitutional Law (Toronto, 1918); and The Correspondence and Reports of the Minister of Justice and Orders in Council upon the subject of Dominion and Provincial Legislation, 1867–1906. The federal and provincial parliaments issue their own 'Rules of Procedure'. There is no adequate modern book on the government of Canada. Sir John Bourinot, How Canada is governed (Toronto, 1895), and W. R. Riddell, The Constitution of Canada (New Haven, 1917), are useful for general purposes. The former's Parliamentary Procedure and Practice in the Dominion of Canada (ed. Flint, Toronto, 1903) is valuable. The second part of E. Porritt, The Evolution of the Dominion of Canada (Yonkers-on-Hudson, 1918) is serviceable. Lord Bryce, Modern Democracies, vol. i (London, 1921) contains an interesting study of Canadian government. The Report of Sir George Murray on the Public Business of Canada (November 30, 1912) and The Senate's Report on the Machinery of Government (July 2, 1919) are documents of importance. There is a good short summary of Canadian government as organized in April 1890 in House of Commons Papers (1890), 194, pp. 6 ff. For the withholding of royal assent, see House of Lords Papers (1894), 196.]

¹ Whittaker v. The Mayor and Councillors of Durban, [1920] 36 Times Law Reports, 784.

NOTE.—On June 14, 1922, the dominion parliament amended the Supreme Court Act to allow appeals to the supreme court of Canada from opinions pronounced by the highest court of final resort in any province on any matter referred to it for hearing or consideration by a lieutenant-governor in council, provided that such opinions are declared by provincial statutes to be judgements of such courts of final resort and that appeals shall be therefrom as from judgements in actions.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE NATURE OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

SUGGESTIONS looking towards some form of union among the provinces of British North America are frequent in Canadian history from 1784, when the idea was first mooted by Lieutenant-Colonel Morse,¹ to the eve of 1867. Little, however, of the nature of the suggested union can be gained from a study of the extant proposals. If we except the abortive Act of Union² for Upper and Lower Canada in 1822, no one except Chief Justice Smith seems to have worked out a scheme in any detail,³ and his proposals are so vague that it is impossible to decide whether he had in mind a legislative union, a confederation, or a federation. John Beverley Robinson⁴ desired to unite the provinces by 'giving them a common legislature and erecting them into a kingdom'. The phrase seems to point to a legislative union, and this assumption is strengthened by the emphasis which Robinson laid on the fact that the new government would be clearly distinguished from the republican institutions of the United States. There was, however, no political discussion, no examination of the nature and essence of the scheme.

With Lord Durham we are in a clearer atmosphere, and he at least defines his terms: 'Two kinds of union have been proposed—federal and legislative. By the first the separate legislature of each province would be preserved in its present form and retain almost all its present attributes of internal legislation, the federal legislature exercising no power save in

¹ Canadian Archives Report (1884), p. liii.

² Kennedy, op. cit., pp. 307 ff.

³ Ibid., pp. 203 ff.

⁴ Quoted in Egerton and Grant, op. cit., p. 147. Cf. Sewell and Robinson, Plan for a General Legislative Union of the British Provinces in North America (London, 1824).

those matters which may have been expressly ceded to it by the constituent provinces. A legislative union would imply a complete incorporation of the provinces included in it under one legislature, exercising universal and sole legislative authority over all of them in exactly the same manner as the parliament legislates alone for the whole of the British Isles.¹ By a 'federal union' Durham meant the creation of a central government to which the constituent provinces would delegate certain powers. In other words, the national government would be a delegation from the provincial governments for the carrying out of certain specific purposes. Such a conception raises the question, Can such a government be called 'a federal government'? This question must be discussed at this point, because, as will appear later, such a discussion is germane to any consideration of the debates in the parliament of Canada in 1865.

Without examining the nature of political unions in the ancient world, on which historians and jurists differ, in American history such a union as that proposed by Lord Durham appears to have been called a confederation. 'The perpetual Confederation' of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Plymouth, and New Haven (1643-84), and Franklin's 'Draft for Union' in 1754, are cases in point.² In both cases the general or national government was a delegate. It existed on sufferance of creating principles. The best illustration, however, is found in the Articles of confederation proposed in 1777 and ratified in 1781. Owing their immediate origin to the necessity for military union, they have in addition behind them a political philosophy based on experience. The earliest signs of democratic tendencies in North America are to be found in local government. Here was the pregnant school of political training. As a consequence it is not surprising to find a mistrust of a strong central government running through the whole conception of the union. The unifying machinery created for the purposes of the revolutionary war was not only weak in those aspects known to every school-boy, but was deliberately made a delegation from states which retained, not theoretically but actually, their political sovereignty. A clear-cut relation of principals and delegate was set up, such a scheme of government being known as a confederation. In other words and in legal language, the national government was not sovereign, nor was it endowed with plenary powers within its sphere. It was, as Robert Morris, superintendent of finance for the Thirteen Colonies in 1781-4, said, 'a government whose sole authority consists in the power of framing recommendations'. When Hamilton proposed the conference at Philadelphia which framed the constitution of the United States, it was with the idea of creating 'an adequate federal government'. The new government which took the place of that under the Articles of confederation was not the agent of the states. It springs, in theory and in statement at least, from the people, and over them within its sphere it has sovereign and plenary power. Allowing that the convention was called merely to revise the confederation and allowing that the general tone of the convention pointed to something quite different from the constitutional theory superficially found in the written document and elaborated by the supreme court, the fact remains that the convention created something new—a federation—as James Wilson of Pennsylvania saw at the time.¹ This is the view taken of the constitution by the courts. A federation may originate historically in many ways ; but once the federation is formed the current of historical and legal opinion is that the central and the provincial or state governments have co-ordinate authority. Nor does the fact that the powers given to the national government may be specifically enumerated, and the residue of undefined powers may be reserved to the states or to the people, enter into the discussion. To the un-critical student the fact might point to delegation. But a federal government is created for national purposes and for the undertaking of international obligations ; and if those purposes are to be carried out and those obligations enforced—as they could not be under a confederation—then the national government must be endowed with the plenitude of sovereignty within its sphere. That sphere may be defined, or implication may widen its definition, because of the ‘ incidental and instrumental powers ’, as Judge Cooley said, necessary to its effectual functioning, but definition or non-definition is immaterial. Finally, in this connexion, it is significant that, when the civil war arose to test the nature of the American constitution, the Southern States called themselves ‘ the confederate States of America ’. Their actual constitution may not point to either looseness of union or to weakness of co-operation. Military success alone could finally have tested it ; but they deliberately chose a name for their political organization pointing to the loosely cemented régime before the creation of the United States, and their army was known as the ‘ confederate army ’ as distinguished from ‘ the federal army of the United States ’.

¹ Report, vol. ii, p. 304 (ed. Lucas).

² Macdonald, Select Charters, vol. i, pp. 94 ff.

¹ Elliot's Debates, vol. i, p. 119 ; vol. ii, p. 440.

When we come to consider the unification of the provinces of British North America, the first thing which strikes us in the documents is the mixed and confused use of terms. In the confidential memorandum¹ drawn up in 1864, which was the basis for the coalition ministry pledged to carry out the unification, ‘ federal principle ’, ‘ federal union ’, and ‘ confederation ’ are all used to describe the political scheme which brought conservatives and liberals together. The inexactitude of the phraseology might be put down to lack of political training were it not for the fact that, during the debates² on the Quebec resolutions in the parliament of Canada in February 1865, ‘ federation ’ and ‘ confederation ’ seem to have been deliberately used to confuse the issue. It is clear that there was a certain amount of camouflage. Macdonald's attitude can be judged from two quotations, taken widely apart, from his speech of February 6 : 'The conference having come to the conclusion that a legislative union, pure and simple, was impracticable, our next attempt was to form a government upon federal principles, which would give to the general government the strength of a legislative and administrative union, while at the same time it preserved that liberty of action for the different sections which is allowed by a federal union.'¹ 'We . . . strengthen the central parliament and make the confederation one people and one government, instead of five peoples and five governments, with merely a point of authority connecting us to a limited and insufficient extent . . . this is to be one united province with the local governments and legislatures subordinate to the general government and legislature'²

¹ Pope, Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, vol. i, p. 344. See above, pp. 295–6.

² Parliamentary Debates on the Subject of the Confederation of the British North American Provinces (Quebec, 1865).

In the first quotation, 'federal' is used when the 'liberty' of the provinces is referred to ; in the second, 'confederation'—the designation historically connected with loosely organized unions—is used when the real nature of Macdonald's proposals is referred to. That real nature was nothing else than a thinly-veiled legislative union—a 'federation' or a 'confederation' (Macdonald did not care what it was called)—in which the provinces should be merely municipal agents of the national government. It is not without significance that in the title of the official debates the word 'confederation' appears. The object was to carry the proposals. It remained for the astute mind of Antoine Dorion to challenge the ambiguities : 'The confederation I advocated was a real confederation giving the largest powers to the local governments and merely a delegated authority to the general government—in that respect differing in toto from the one now proposed, which gives all the powers to the central government and reserves for the local governments the smallest possible amount of freedom of action.’¹ Dorion’s clearness may have influenced the official title, and it cannot have been entirely an accident that during the ministry of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who himself came from Dorion’s cénacle, provincial legislation was largely free from dominion interference, a matter which will be considered later in another connexion.

¹ Parliamentary Debates on the Subject of the Confederation of the British North American Provinces (Quebec, 1865), p. 32.

² Ibid., pp. 41 ff.

For many years after 1867 the provinces held a subordinate position as Dorion feared. Until the advent to power of the liberal party in 1896, ‘provincial rights’ had a small place in conservative policy, dominated as it was by the personality or memory of Macdonald. But, however much party politics may have forced issues in constitutional law—a matter with which we have no concern—there was a safeguard independent of politics, of the opinions expressed or implied by the fathers of Canadian unification, and of the fact that they had to be content with an agreement which was but a skeleton and could not embody Macdonald’s real aims if it were to be accepted by the provinces. That safeguard is found in the fact that the privy council has always considered the British North America Act as a British statute, has held that its interpretation must begin from that point of view, and that all its parts must be given their natural sense when read in conjunction. As a consequence, and without for the moment considering the light which that interpretation has thrown on the nature of the Canadian constitution, we have been saved from much emotional challenge, from the so-called invasion of sacrosanct instruments, and from any attempt to confine interpretations within a preconceived Canadian notion of the essence of the Canadian system. These facts are neither academic nor legal. They are of practical importance. Canada has accepted the principle:² but it has been rejected by the high court of Australia, of which the majority tends to believe in the immunity of instrumentalities. There are thus grave clashes of interpretation, because the Australian high court maintains that the Australian constitution cannot be subject to the ordinary rules governing a British statute, which must be modified by the conception of the constitution in the minds of the founders of the commonwealth.

¹ Ibid., p. 250.

² Abbott v. City of St. John, 40 S. C. R. 595.

The almost necessarily incomplete nature of the British North America Act has resulted in a series of legal decisions on which it is possible to found some idea of the nature of Canadian federalism. First of all, the dominion parliament is not a delegation from the imperial parliament or from the provinces.¹ It has full and complete powers within its reference. Secondly, the provincial parliaments are not delegations from the imperial parliament: 'When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in sect. 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the imperial parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by sect. 92 as the imperial parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area, the local legislature is supreme and has the same authority as the imperial parliament or the parliament of the dominion.'² Thirdly, the provincial parliaments are not delegations from the dominion parliament: 'The provincial legislature of New Brunswick . . . derives no authority from the government of Canada, and its status is in no way analogous to a municipal institution, which is an authority constituted for purposes of local administration. It possesses powers not of administration merely, but of legislation, in the strictest sense of that word; and, within the limits assigned by sect. 92 of the Act of 1867, these powers are exclusive and supreme.'¹

¹ The Attorney-General for Canada v. Cain and Gilhula, A. C. 542.

² Hodge v. The Queen, 9 App. Cases, 117.

From these interpretations it is clear (1) that the dominion parliament is a sovereign parliament within the meaning of section 91 of the Act of 1867, and in no sense a delegate, related to the provinces as principals; (2) that the provincial parliaments are in no sense delegates either of the imperial parliament or of the dominion parliament. Further light is thrown on the matter by a famous passage in the judgement delivered by Lord Watson in the last case: 'The Act of 1867 . . . nowhere professes to curtail in any respect the rights and privileges of the crown or to disturb the relations then subsisting between the sovereign and the provinces. The object of the Act was neither to weld the provinces into one, nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority, but to create a federal government in which they should all be represented, entrusted with the exclusive administration of affairs in which they had a common interest, each province retaining its independence and autonomy. . . . As regards those matters which by sect. 92 are specially reserved for provincial legislation, the legislation of each province continues . . . as supreme as it was before the passing of the Act.'

A fourth conclusion emerges. The provinces remain 'independent and autonomous'. They have not been destroyed. They possess the executive power 'before confederation minus the powers surrendered at confederation'.² In all these cases the court did not discuss the nature of that surrender. It accepted the fact. It interpreted that fact, however, in the sense of a federation and not of a confederation. The conclusion we can come to seems to be that Canada is a federation in essence; that is, that the central national government is in no sense a delegation; that the provincial governments are in no sense 'municipal'; and that national and local governments exercise co-ordinate authority and are severally sovereign within the sphere specifically or generically or by implication constitutionally granted to them. This construction agrees with the preamble of the British North America Act, 'Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united,' however loosely that preamble may originally have been constructed; and it seems to override any idea that Canada is a confederation. In the incidences of construction—to which we shall return—the federal conception may not be complete, but the essence seems to be established.

¹ The Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. The Receiver-General of New Brunswick, [1892] A. C. 437.

² Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions, vol. i, p. 124.

Unfortunately, however, in an Australian case¹ before the judicial committee of the privy council in 1914, Lord Haldane made some remarks which appear to contradict views previously laid down and to reopen the whole question. It is well to quote him at length. During the pleadings he said: 'With deference to a great many people who talk on platforms just now of the "federal system", in Canada there is no federal system. What happened was this: An Act was passed in 1867 which made a new start and divided certain powers of government, some being given to the parliament of Canada, and some to the parliament of the provinces. The provinces were created de novo. The provinces did not come together and make a federal arrangement under which they retained their existing powers and parted with certain of them and an imperial statute has got to ratify the bargain; on the contrary, the whole vitality and ambit of the Canadian constitution was a surrender, if you like, first, and then devolution. . . . The meaning of a federal government is that a number of states come together and put certain of their powers into common custody, and that is the federal constitution in Australia, but in Canada not at all.'² In the judgement he said: ' But there remains a question which goes to the root of the controversy between the parties. Were the Royal Commissions Acts intra vires of the commonwealth parliament? This is a question which can only be answered by examining the scheme of the Act of 1900, which established the commonwealth constitution. About the fundamental principle of that constitution there can be no doubt. It is federal in the strict sense of the term, as a reference to what was established on a different footing in Canada shows. The British North America Act of 1867 commences with a preamble that the then provinces have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. In a loose sense the word "federal" may be used, as it is there used, to describe any arrangements under which self-contained states agree to delegate their powers to a common government with a view to entirely new constitutions, even of the states themselves. But the natural and literal interpretation of the word confines its application to cases in which these states, while agreeing on a measure of delegation, yet in the main continue to preserve their original constitutions. Now, as regards Canada, the second of the resolutions passed at Quebec in 1864, on which the British North America Act was founded, shows that what was in the minds of those who agreed on the resolutions was a general government charged with matters of common interest, and new and merely local governments for the provinces. The provinces were to have fresh and much-restricted constitutions, their governments being entirely remodelled. This plan was carried out by the imperial statute of 1867. By the 91st section a general power was given to the new parliament of Canada to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada without restriction to specific subjects, and excepting only the subjects specifically and exclusively assigned to the provincial legislatures by sect. 92. There followed an enumeration of subjects which were to be dealt with by the dominion parliament, but this enumeration was not to restrict the generality of the power conferred on it. The Act, therefore, departs widely from the true federal model adopted in the constitution of the United States, the tenth amendment to which declares that the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution nor prohibited to it by the states are reserved to the states respectively, or to their people. Of the Canadian constitution the true view appears, therefore, to be that, although it was founded on the Quebec resolutions and so must be accepted as a treaty of union among these provinces, yet when once enacted by the imperial parliament it constituted a fresh departure, and established new dominion and provincial governments with defined powers and duties both derived from the Act of the imperial parliament which was their legal source.'

¹ Attorney-General for the Commonwealth of Australia v. Colonial Sugar Refining Co., Ltd., [1914] A. C. 237.

² 30 Times Law Reports, p. 205.

Lord Haldane's statements can be broken up and considered under several heads. First, he defines a federal state as one in which 'states, while agreeing to a measure of delegation, yet in the main continue to preserve their original constitutions'— 'a federal arrangement under which they retained their existing powers and parted with certain of them'. It cannot but be a surprise to constitutional students to find a federal constitution defined as one in which the central or national government is a delegation from the constituent states or provinces. Lord Haldane's definition appears to be based on an erroneous view of the essence of a federation, and seems to have confused a federation with a confederation. Secondly, it need not be denied that a federation may originate as he suggests; but it is surely illogical to confuse a constitution with the historical processes by which it originated. Lord Haldane would have us assume that unless certain antecedent procedure takes place it is improper to describe the result as a federal state. Such a position cannot seriously be maintained. Political definitions must be confined to facts as they are, and must not be made meaningless by the dead hand of historical or social movements out of which the facts grew. Thirdly, he cites the United States as a true type of federation because it fulfills his processes. It is obvious to ask, Is the United States no longer federal because it has admitted to the original 'measure of delegation' new states other than the original colonies which alone were parties to the original 'federal agreement'? Would Lord Haldane have us believe that the admission of newer states, which made no pact, has destroyed the federal character of the American constitution? Finally his history of the formation of the Canadian constitution is too partial and incomplete to be entirely true. If we concede that old rights were entirely surrendered, and that their retention, minus those conceded to the national government, is necessary to a federal union, then we have no federation in Canada. But it is impossible to make this a rule of constitutional law. In the dominion the provinces were not formed de novo. The united province of Canada was divided and the executive authority was maintained in the divisions expressly by the Act of 1867, subject to those changes necessary for the general union. The constitutions of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were also, subject to the provisions of the Act, continued as they existed at the Union.¹ It was doubtless with these sections in mind that Lord Watson laid down the principle already quoted,² which is completely at variance with Lord Haldane's opinion. Lord Watson's conception has been acted on to such an extent that to abandon it would upset much of the structure of the constitution. It has established the generally accepted theory that Canada is a federation in which sovereign power is divided among co-ordinate governments, none of which are delegations and among which the provincial governments are not new creations, but retain 'their independence and autonomy'.³

¹ British North America Act, ss. 64, 65, 88.

² See above, p. 407.

³ See, however, Lord Haldane's judgement in Re Manitoba Initiative and

The real questions to decide, shorn of all theories, are these : Are the national and provincial governments related to one another as principal or delegate ? What is the real and precise nature of the authority which they may exercise within their spheres ? We have seen that it has been laid down that the various parliaments in Canada are sovereign within the orbit of their established jurisdictions, and that they compel obedience as such. Lord Haldane's opinions, therefore, cannot be accepted as overthrowing the federal essence of the Canadian constitution.

When we come, however, to consider some particular features of the constitution—the Canadian senate, the office of the lieutenant-governor, and the dominion power of disallowing provincial Acts—we may find modifications in the actual working of the federal idea, which yet do not destroy the essence. There is evidence, too, of tendencies to bring these features into accordance with the federal idea.

It must at once be conceded that the Canadian senate is not the product of a single and intelligible political principle. Indeed, it attempts to embody two ideas—nomination by the crown, and a timid hankering after representation of grouped provinces. It may be that this attempt has caused it to become almost ' a cipher ' surrounded ' with derisive state ' and ' the trappings of impotence ' ;¹ but once an elective chamber was ruled out of the range of possibilities if federation were to take place, and once the constituent provinces decided on the necessity of a second chamber,² it is hard to see how the senate could have embodied the single federal principle. On the other hand, Macdonald went out of his way to emphasize how, even with nomination, the provinces would be protected : ' In order to protect local interests and to prevent sectional jealousies, Referendum Act, which appears to modify the position which he took in this Australian case ([1919] A. C. 935 ; 35 Times Law Reports, p. 630).

¹ Goldwin Smith, Canada and the Canadian Question (1891), p. 164.

² Confederation Debates, pp. 34 ff.

it was found necessary that the three great divisions into which British North America is separated should be represented in the upper house on the principle of equality.¹ With temporary obscurity, into which we need not here enter,² this plan has been adhered to, and in 1915, when a reconstruction of the senate was necessary for political and geographical reasons, the dominion parliament accepted the principle and it was embodied in an imperial Act.³

To Macdonald's prophecy, however, of the impossibility of the senate being filled with 'partisans and political supporters',⁴ his own political life gave the initial lie. Dorion and Dunkin saw the party possibilities and the weakness in construction. The latter also made an interesting forecast: 'I think I can defy them to show that the cabinet can be formed on any other principle than that of a representation of the several provinces in that cabinet, for it is admitted that the provinces are not really represented to any federal intent in the legislative council [i. e. the senate]. The cabinet here must discharge all that kind of function which in the United States is performed, in the federal sense, by the senate. And precisely as in the United States, wherever a federal check is needed, the senate has to do federal duty as an integral part of the executive government, so here, when that check cannot be so got, we must seek such substitute for it as we may in a federal composition of the executive council [i. e. the cabinet]; that is to say, by making it distinctly representative of the provinces.'⁵ While Dunkin's fears that the cabinet would be weakened by sectional differences and by rendering insecure the constitutional principle of united cabinet responsibility have not been realized, yet he foretold what has become an interesting federal by-product in Canada, most federal cabinets being formed, as far as possible, on a

¹ Cf. British North America Act, ss. 21, 22.

² Keith, Imperial Unity and the Dominions, pp. 394 ff.

³ Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 7897; 5 & 6 George V, c. 45 (Imperial Act).

⁴ Kennedy, op. cit., p. 609.

⁵ Confederation Debates, p. 497.

recognition of the claims of the constituent provinces.¹ On the other hand, it is not uninteresting to note that in the midst of many suggestions for reform, if not for abolition of the senate, the quasi-federal aspect has not been obscured. Sir George Ross, for example, maintains that 'the first and only duty of the senate is to consider the treaty rights of all the provinces under the constitution'.²

When we come to consider the dominion power³ of appointing the lieutenant-governors of the provinces and of disallowing provincial Acts in relation to the nature of Canadian federalism, we approach a problem which is as old as federation. On the one hand, Macdonald in 1865 emphasized the necessity 'that the chief executive officer in each of the provinces must be subordinate' because the intention was to create subordinate local governments and legislatures. Dorion saw here the negation of any such thing as responsible provincial government, while Dunkin found in the provision for disallowance the impossibility of any real provincial autonomy.⁴

Before attempting to consider the question, it is well to recall that Hamilton, who may be said to have originated the federal as opposed to the confederate constitution of the thirteen colonies, deliberately proposed at the Philadelphia convention that the president should appoint the governors of the various states, and that he should have an absolute veto on the Acts of the state legislatures.⁵ Diplomatic reasons prevented the suggestion from being incorporated in the constitution, but it is important to note that no one considered it opposed to the essence of a federal constitution, least of all Hamilton, who had the clearest conception of the nature of a federation. The

¹ Porritt, Evolution of the Dominion of Canada, pp. 357 ff. Cf. Laurier's opinions on the principle, House of Commons Debates, May 15, 1909, and see above, pp. 317-18, 381.

² Ross, The Senate of Canada (1914), p. 51.

³ British North America Act, ss. 56, 58, 90.

⁴ Confederation Debates, pp. 42, 225, 502.

⁵ Elliot's Debates, V, App. 5.

power, at least over state legislation, was soon vested in the supreme court.¹

It is unnecessary to linger over questions raised concerning the appointment of the lieutenant-governors. Two of them have been dismissed in Canadian history since federation by the governor-general, and at first there was a general disposition to consider them mere creatures of the dominion government. That view has been entirely abandoned. The method of their appointment is evidence of the federal link; but it has been decided that they possess in full the provincial authority,² that there is no constitutional anomaly in their appointment, and that when once appointed they are as much representatives of the crown for every purpose of government in the provinces as the governor-general is for all purposes of dominion government.³

The dominion power of disallowance is of more vital interest.⁴ The governor-general, on the advice of responsible ministers (in this case, the federal minister of justice), has the power to disallow a provincial Act within one year after the receipt of the Act from the lieutenant-governor of the province. We can well understand a principle of disallowance where a constitutional question arises, or where dominion or imperial interests are threatened by a provincial Act; but it would be safer if the decision in such cases were left to the courts as in the United States, since in a federation differences on constitutional law must frequently arise. The resolution of the problem of intra vires or ultra vires ought not to be left to the minister of justice. This tends to make him too supreme, and to detract from the character of the supreme court of Canada or of the privy

¹ Statutes at Large (U.S.A.), i, September 24, 1789.

² The Attorney-General for Ontario v. Mercer, 8 App. Cas. 767.

³ The Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. The Receiver-General of New Brunswick, [1892] A. C. 437.

⁴ See in detail, Keith, Responsible Government, vol. ii, pp. 725 ff.; Imperial Unity, pp. 432 ff.; Lefroy, Canada's Federal System, vol. i, pp. 30-4, 42-6.

council.¹ For many years, however, after 1867 the dominion government considered it was justified in disallowing provincial Acts which appeared unjust or oppressive—through, for example, interference with vested rights without compensation, or through the impairing of contractual obligations. Provincial Acts were disallowed under these principles.

It appears early to have been a working convention of the Canadian constitution that, as the courts would deal with legislation ultra vires of the provinces, the power of disallowance was intended to cover cases outside legal review. In other words, the power of disallowance was inserted in the British North America Act to cover, in general terms, unjust, confiscatory, or ex post facto legislation, against which there are express safeguards in the constitution of the United States.²

A priori, there is a certain amount of support for this contention. It is well known that the constitution of the United States was carefully studied by those who laid the foundations and organized the framework of Canadian federation. It is not unreasonable to suppose that they had in mind in the 'disallowance sections' a means of dealing with provincial legislation which might be judged unsound in principle. Cartier, as we shall see, explicitly said that this was the intention. As a matter of fact, from federation to 1893, the weight of evidence, both from the bench and from the federal cabinet, is in favour of this point of view.

On the judicial side there are opinions from Justices Ramsay,

¹ See a protest in these terms from the government of British Columbia, August 22, 1905, Provincial Legislation, 1904-6 (Ottawa, 1907), pp. 148 ff.: 'The effect of disallowance . . . is to make the minister of justice the highest judicial dignitary in the land for the determination of constitutional questions, and in reality above the supreme court of Canada. The decisions of the supreme court of Canada are open to question in the judicial committee of the privy council. From the decision of the minister of justice there is no appeal. He stands alone.'

² As to security of property see an important article by J. Murray Clark in the Journal of Canadian Bankers' Association (January 1919).

Strong, and Chief Justice Draper which can be summarized in the words of the latter: 'The governor-general . . . is entrusted with authority, to which a corresponding duty attaches, to disallow any law contrary to reason, or to natural justice, or equity.'¹ The opinions from the Canadian executive can be summarized in chronological order and are found under date in the various reports of the federal ministers of justice.²

First, there is the general report of Sir John A. Macdonald (July 1, 1867–November 6, 1873)³ dated June 8, 1868. He recommends that the minister of justice should report on provincial Acts, basing his reports on one or all of four heads, (a) as being altogether illegal or unconstitutional, (b) as being illegal or unconstitutional in part, (c) as clashing in cases of concurrent jurisdiction with federal legislation, (d) as affecting the interest of the dominion as a whole. This general scheme has been claimed to support, on the one hand, the contention that nothing is said concerning unjust or unsound legislation, and, on the other hand, to include it under the general term 'illegal', which appears to be distinguished from 'unconstitutional'. Up to 1896, the latter contention seems largely to have held the field. Unjust or unsound legislation figured with unconstitutional reasons and reasons based on general federal policy in the disallowance of provincial Acts.

In 1871 Sir John A. Macdonald disallowed a railway Act of the province of Manitoba because 'no sufficient provision was made for compensation for any infringement of the rights of property or other vested rights'.

In 1874 the lieutenant-governor of Prince Edward Island reserved 'The Land Purchase Act, 1874' for the governor-general's pleasure on the grounds that it was subversive of the rights of property, ruinous to the proprietors, and a dangerous precedent. It was disallowed for the above reasons, and because the arbitration was arbitrary and made no provision against impartiality and for speedy settlement. The report was presented by the deputy-minister, and the minister of justice, the Hon. Telephore Fournier (July 8, 1874–May 18, 1875), concurred.

¹ See Ramsay J. in Angers v. Queen Insurance Co., 22 L. C. J., and Corporation of Three Rivers v. Sulte, 5 L. N.; Strong J. in Severn v. The Queen, 2 S. C. R.; Draper C.J. in Re Goodhue, 19 Grant. For a direct opposite opinion, however, see Casault J. in Guay v. Blanchet, 5 Q. L. R. (1879).

² Hodgins, Dominion and Provincial Legislation, 1867 ff.

³ The dates in parentheses refer to the term of office as minister of justice.

In 1874 a Manitoba Act was disallowed by Sir A. A. Dorion (November 7, 1873–June 1, 1874) because it might tend to interfere with the survey of public lands.

In 1876 an Act of the legislature of Prince Edward Island was disallowed by the Hon. R. Scott, acting-minister of justice, because it dealt with the rights of parties then under or subject to litigation under the Act which it proposed to amend, and because there was no provision saving the rights and proceedings of such persons.

In 1881 the Ontario legislature passed an Act granting all persons rights to use improvements for purposes of floating down logs on payment of a reasonable toll. An appeal was made to the governor-general for disallowance, on the grounds of unconstitutionality, of depriving the petitioner of private rights, of being ex post facto. The Act was disallowed because it seemed 'to take away the use of the owner's property and give it to another', and because, assuming that the local legislature had such a power, 'it devolves upon the dominion government to see that such power is not exercised in flagrant violation of private rights and natural justice, especially when, as in this case, in addition to interfering with private rights in the way alluded to, the Act overrides a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction by declaring retrospectively that the law always was, and is, different from that laid down by the court' (Hon. J. Macdonald, October 17, 1878–May 20, 1881). Ontario objected in strong terms against any review of a provincial Act inter vires of the province, and re-enacted the Act of 1881, only to have it again disallowed by the dominion.

In 1887 Manitoba passed an Act providing that every person connected with any public work should be deemed a servant of the crown, and that the sanction of the minister of public works should be deemed in the courts of justice full and competent authority and justification for any work done with the approval and on behalf of such minister. Sir John A. Macdonald, for the minister of justice, recommended disallowance because the immunity from liabilities and responsibilities was of an unreal and extraordinary character and manifestly interfered with private rights.

In 1888 New Brunswick passed an Act which appeared to give a new company rights inconsistent with rights granted to a dominion company. Petitioners claimed that their charter had been ratified by the province, that no cause was shown for forfeiture of their charter, and that proprietary and contractual rights were violated. Sir John Thompson (September 25, 1885–December 12, 1894) recommended disallowance, because the Act interfered with and restricted a dominion Act, and because it diminished the value of franchises already granted.

In 1888 Quebec passed an Act to enable the province to issue debentures for the purpose of redeeming outstanding liabilities and to save the amount of interest paid yearly by the province. Sir John Thompson observed that the Act authorized the province to violate contracts without compensation, that it would affect the credit of the province and might indicate the possibility that faith might not be kept inviolate between the province and its creditors, and that it might hurt the other provinces. Quebec undertook to repeal the objectionable sections.¹

¹ In connexion with this Act see Sir John Macdonald's letter to Tupper, July 20, 1888, Pope, Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, pp. 417 ff.

In the same year a Manitoba Act was amended on suggestion from the dominion, in order not to affect prejudicially the credit of the municipalities of the province.

In 1889 the legislature of New Brunswick passed an Act forfeiting mining leases under conditions set out in the Act. Sir John Thompson characterized the Act as 'seeming to be at variance with the principles of justice and to invade the rights of property, which it is so important to preserve for the credit of the whole country and for the safety of private persons. If it is desirable that a province should resume any part of its patrimony, the methods adopted should be those which recognize and provide for the rights which have accrued under the sanction of the crown'. He recommended amendment to remove such objectionable features as he enumerated. Shortly afterwards the same minister of justice recommended the province of Quebec so to amend a mining law of 1890 as to remove 'any objection to the Act on the ground of its being a confiscation of existing private rights as claimed by the petitioners'. He also brought about the amendment of a Nova Scotia Act of 1892 because it prejudiced rights under litigation. In 1893 an Ontario Act occasioned the federal criticism that a statute which interfered with vested rights of property or with the obligations of contracts without compensation ought to come within the dominion sphere of disallowance.

Thompson, however, in 1886 and in 1888 seems to have deviated from his general principles. Once he refused to consider the question whether an Act was just or unjust, seeing that it was undoubtedly intra vires of the provinces; and once, while pronouncing the legislation under consideration as pernicious, he refused to recommend disallowance because it did not affect the interests of the dominion. The Hon. Edward Blake (May 19, 1875–June 8, 1877), in refusing a petition against an Ontario statute (38 Vict. c. 75), said that he did not conceive that he was called upon 'to express an opinion upon the allegations of the petition as to the injustice alleged to be effected by the Act. This was a matter for the local legislature.’¹

These three opinions are more or less isolated in the years 1867–93. Whatever other motives—if any—which may have been at work during that period, it is clear that there is a certain consistency of purpose in dealing with provincial legislation which appeared to hurt private property, to invalidate contracts, or to be contrary to what were known as ‘sound principles of legislation’. It lies outside the discussion to search for or to examine motives which political writers have suggested. All that can be said here is that the constitutional power of disallowance was consistently used during these years to protect those spheres of provincial civil life which are protected explicitly or by implication in the constitution of the United States.

From 1893 to Mr. Doherty’s instance of disallowance in 1918, we see a new principle at work which is largely an extension of the idea formulated by Blake. It is not uninteresting to note that this new principle runs parallel with the definitions of Canadian federalism which have already been considered. It is true that the dicta in Hodge v. The Queen are older; but Lord Watson’s dicta were uttered in 1892. In Brophy v. Attorney-General of Manitoba in 1895 Lord Herschell said: ‘In relation to the subjects specified in section 92 of the British North America Act and not falling within those set forth in section 91, the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures may be said to be absolute.’² Three years later he said: ‘The suggestions that the power might be abused so as to amount to a practical confiscation of property does not warrant the imposition by the courts of any limit upon the absolute power of legislation conferred. The supreme legislative power in relation to any subject-matter is always capable of abuse, but it is not to be assumed that it will be improperly used ; if it is, the only remedy is an appeal to those by whom the legislature is elected.’¹

¹ Cf. Blake’s opinion, however, on a Quebec statute (38 Victoria, c. 17) in 1876, which differs somewhat from that referred to above.

² [1895] A. C. 202.

This period was the golden age of provincial rights, when the privy council was gradually bringing to light the essentially federal nature of the Canadian constitution. Indeed, the new era in the sphere of dominion disallowance is almost ushered in by a federal minister of justice relying on Lord Herschell’s words in the last case to which reference has been made.

Indirectly, in 1898, the provinces of Canada received support from a dispatch from the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain to the governor of Newfoundland refusing to disallow a Newfoundland Act. It is true that the dispatch deals with the imperial power of the exercise of disallowance in relation to legislation of a self-governing dominion ; but the principles involved are common to those just considered. There is no imperial issue brought forward : ‘ it is nowhere alleged that the interests of any other part of the empire are involved or that the Act is in any way repugnant to imperial legislation.’ The Act dealt with financial and administrative matters of a local nature. Disputes in that connexion must be settled locally. Where disallowance was claimed on account of policy, Mr. Chamberlain would not consider the claim. The whole tenor of the dispatch lies in the idea that, granted the constitutional power to legislate, and granted that imperial policy is not involved, to disallow would be to negative self-government : ‘ My action has throughout been governed by constitutional principles, on which I am bound to act ; and I think it is desirable that it should be made quite clear that in accepting the privilege of self-government, the colony has accepted the full responsibilities inseparable from that privilege, and that if the machinery it has provided for the work of legislation and administration has proved defective, or the persons to whom it has entrusted its destinies have failed to discharge their trust, they cannot look to her majesty's government to supplement or remedy these defects, or to judge between them and their duly chosen representatives.' ¹ The dispatch touches hands with Edward Blake and with the dicta of the judicial committee of the privy council. If a province has self-government, if no dominion interests or policies are violated, if the legislation is constitutionally intra vires, then the people cannot expect redress, and it ought not to be given if such legislation appears unjust. The remedy lies in their gift of responsible and representative government.

¹ Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for the Provinces of Ontario, &c., [1898] A. C. 700 (The Fisheries’ Case).

When we resume the consideration of disallowance we almost at once see the true federal idea at work. In 1897 Sir Oliver Mowat (July 13, 1896–November 17, 1897) laid it down that it was none of his business as minister of justice to review a provincial Act because of injustice. In 1898 the Hon. David Mills (November 18, 1897–February 7, 1902) based his refusal to disallow on the passage already quoted from the Fisheries' Case. In 1900 we see the influence of Mr. Chamberlain's dispatch in a letter which Mr. Mills addressed to the premier of Ontario. He says that he will interfere where it is clear that a well-defined dominion policy is endangered by provincial legislation. It is fair to add that he disallowed in 1898 a Yukon Ordinance which unjustly discriminated against certain classes of citizens. There is a difference, however, between the organization of the Yukon and the older provinces, and Mr. Mills's more constant opinion is found in his report of December 31, 1901, in relation to a British Columbia statute : ' Your excellency's government is not in any wise responsible for the principle of the legislation, and, as has been already stated in this report with regard to an Ontario statute, the proper remedy in such cases lies with the legislature or its constitutional judges.'

¹ Dispatch of December 5, 1898, Parliamentary Papers, Cd. 8137 ; cf. The Times, January 23, 1899.

Sir Charles Fitzpatrick (February 11, 1902–June 4, 1906) followed Mr. Mills. He did not conceal his dislike for legislation which diminished or affected existing rights, but he concluded that ‘there is a difficulty about your excellency in council giving relief in such cases without affirming a policy which requires your excellency’s government to put itself to a large extent in the place of the legislature and to judge of the propriety of its acts relative to matters committed by the constitution to the exclusive legislative authority of the province’. This opinion brings the history down to the régime of Sir Allen Aylesworth (June 4, 1906–October 6, 1911).

Protests from the provinces forced the federal government to reconsider its position, especially as they emphasized the fact that local autonomy was apparently insecure, even in spheres where the provinces claimed exclusive jurisdiction. In 1908 Sir Allen Aylesworth, then minister of justice, made a report which was approved by the governor-general, in which he said: ‘It is not intended by the British North America Act that the power of disallowance shall be exercised for the purpose of annulling provincial legislation, even though your excellency’s ministers consider the legislation unjust or oppressive, or in conflict with recognized legal principles, so long as such legislation is within the power of the provincial legislature to enact it.’¹

In 1912, however, on two occasions² the minister of justice, Mr. Doherty, while refusing to disallow for reasons stated, claimed that he entertained no doubt that the power is constitutionally capable of exercise, and may on occasion be properly invoked, for the purpose of preventing, not inconsistently with the public interest, irreparable injustice or undue interference with private rights or property through the operation of local statutes intra vires of the legislatures.

¹ Provincial Legislation, 1904–6, p. 8.

² Lefroy, Treatise on Canadian Constitutional Law, pp. 63–4, 172, n. 47.

On May 30, 1918, he disallowed, with the approval of the governor-general, an Act of the British Columbia legislature (7-8 George V, c. 71), because it diminished substantially the consideration of a contract. He did this after hearing an argument before the dominion prime minister, the minister of public works, and himself, and after notifying the attorney-general for British Columbia and hearing counsel for the petitioners. There are two passages in this report¹ which deserve attention. Firstly, Mr. Doherty lays it down that he does not consider the dominion veto obsolete in cases where hardship, inequality, injustice, or interference with vested rights or contracts are brought forward. While preferring as a rule to leave such cases, where the legislation is intra vires of the province, to be redressed by the local legislature, yet he maintains that there are 'principles governing the exercise of legislative power other than the mere respect and deference due to the expression of the will of the local constituent assembly, which must be considered in the exercise of the prerogative of disallowance'. He refuses to lay down those principles or to formulate general rules, but he suggests that 'interference with vested rights or the obligation of contracts, except for public purposes and upon due indemnity, are processes of legislation which do not appear just or desirable'. Secondly, upon the submission of the attorney-general for British Columbia that disallowance would involve a serious interference with provincial rights, he says: 'Provincial rights are conferred and limited by the British North America Act, and while the provinces have the right to legislate upon the subjects committed to their legislative authority, the power to disallow any such legislation is conferred by the same constitutional instrument upon the governor-general in council, and incident to the power is the duty to exercise it in proper cases. This power and the correspondent duty are conferred for the benefit of the provinces as well as for that of the dominion at large. . . . The mere execution of the power of disallowance does not therefore conflict with provincial rights, although doubtless the responsibility for the exercise of the power which rests with your excellency in council ought to be so regulated as not to be made effective except in those cases in which, as in the present case, the propriety of exercising the power is demonstrated.'

¹ P. C. (May 30, 1918) 1334. The circumstances, however, must be noted. The British Columbia Act was held to hurt an agreement in connexion with lands in the railway belt of that province into which the federal and provincial governments had entered in 1883 with the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Co. Had the dominion allowed the Act, it would have been possible to say that it had repudiated, equally with British Columbia, its obligations and agreements.

This opinion is in direct contrast with that expressed by Sir Allen Aylesworth, and thus elaborated by him in the house of commons: 'I was not, as advising his excellency in council, called upon to think at all of the injustice, of the outrageous character, it might be, of the legislation; but . . . my one inquiry ought to be whether or not there was anything in the legislation itself which went beyond the power of the provincial legislature.' Sir Allen Aylesworth considered that the provincial legislatures within the scope of their jurisdictions were on an absolutely level footing with the parliament of Canada, and that protest against such provincial legislation as was under consideration ought to be fought out at the provincial polls, as must be done in case of similar dominion legislation.¹

In December 1909 a similar line was taken by the province of Ontario. The Ontario government conceded, as it was compelled to do, the right to disallow; but it maintained that that right was technical, and must be judged in conjunction with the interpretation of the British North America Act as a whole, which gave to the provincial governments sovereign powers within their jurisdictions. Any other view would mean that the people of the provinces had not the full enjoyment of their civil rights with reference to those subjects within their well-defined jurisdiction.¹

¹ House of Commons Debates (1909), pp. 1750 ff. Cf. Mr. Justice Riddell in Smith v. City of London, 20 Ont. Law Reports (1909), 133: 'An Act of parliament can do no wrong, though it may do several things that look pretty odd.'

The divergence of opinion is not one merely between two ministers of justice. Professor Lefroy, with a strong catena of cases behind him, maintained that the courts could not disallow a dominion or provincial Act 'merely because it may affect injuriously private rights, or destroy vested rights, or be otherwise unjust or contrary to sound principles of legislature'.² Mr. Justice Riddell, in a famous judgement, lays down the principle that 'the legislature within its jurisdiction can do everything which is not naturally impossible, and is restrained by no rule human or divine. . . . The prohibition "Thou shalt not steal" has no legal force upon the sovereign body, and there would be no necessity for compensation to be given.'³ The courts may, and often must, determine whether or not any Act is constitutional; but once a decision is arrived at establishing the right of a province to legislate on the subject-matter of the Act 'arguments founded on alleged hardship or injustice can have no weight'.⁴

On the one hand is the opinion which holds that the provinces of Canada are sovereign within their established spheres, and that a court, and a fortiori the dominion cabinet, ought not to disallow a provincial Act except when it is clearly unconstitutional. On the other hand is the opinion which holds that the dominion cabinet can veto a provincial Act, otherwise intra vires, when it comes within such description as that given by Mr. Doherty or Professor Lefroy.

Lay opinion may be of little worth, but certain criticisms can ¹ Attorney-general for Ontario to the governor-general of Canada, December 9, 1909.

² Op. cit., p. 70.

³ Florence Mining Company v. The Cobalt Lake Mining Company (1909), 18 Ontario Law Reports, 257.

⁴ Moss C.J. in ibid., p. 293. See inter alia Mr. Justice Riddell's The Constitution of Canada, and the valuable notes on chapter iii.

be submitted. If the constitution is 'similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom',¹ and if the provincial legislatures are in reality what the privy council has already defined them to be—sovereign powers with as full and ample authority as the imperial parliament within their jurisdictions—certain conclusions seem to follow. The rule of British constitutional law must hold that, granted the legislative power, it is impossible to question the justice of the legislation. This is Mr. Justice Riddell's opinion. Redress lies with the people, 'who are the best judges of the laws they are governed by'.² This conception, too, fits in with a federal idea of the nature of Canadian government, suggested, as we have seen, by Lord Watson. Of course, it would not destroy a federal constitution had the Canadian constitution contained a clause like that in the constitution of the United States,³ prohibiting the provinces from impairing the obligation of contracts or from interfering with matters within Mr. Doherty's description. The suggestion merely is this: once it is clear that an Act is constitutional, then its consequences and results in actual life are open to judgement by the electorate alone.

On the other hand, it is submitted that, if Mr. Doherty's position is the correct one, then the federal idea is overthrown, for the legislatures of the provinces cease to be the bodies described by the privy council and take that subordinate position which Macdonald meant them to hold and Professor Dicey appears to believe they possess.⁴ It must not be forgotten that it is possible for such Acts as Mr. Doherty has in mind to be drawn into a clearly defined constitutional issue, and dis-

¹ Cf. Edward Blake: 'A single line imported into the system that complex and somewhat indefinite aggregate called the British constitution' (St. Catharine's Milling and Lumber Co. v. The Queen, 14 App. Cas. 46).

² Riddell, op. cit., p. 98. Mr. Justice Riddell's opinion was approved by the court of appeal for Ontario and by the judicial committee of the privy council (ibid., p. 112).

³ Article I, s. 10.

⁴ Law of the Constitution (8th ed.), chap. iii. Cf. Laski, The Problem of Sovereignty, pp. 267 ff.

allowed because they may infringe on the dominion power to legislate for 'the peace, order, and good government of Canada'. That is a matter for interpretation legally constituted, and it does not appear open to the courts in this connexion 'to substitute their own opinion whether a particular enactment was calculated as a matter of fact and good policy to secure peace, order, and good government, for the decision of the legislature'.¹ It is quite a different thing, however, that the supporters of this opinion mean. The emphasis laid on this position seems to magnify one power allowed by the British North America Act to the dominion government at the expense of the construction of the Act as a whole and of the general elasticity of its terms.

This difficulty of the position is obvious, but it is interesting to note that Cartier supported Mr. Doherty's point of view: 'The presumption is it [the power of disallowance by the federal government] will be exercised in case of unjust or unwise legislation'. He drew from Dunkin apt criticism: 'The hon. gentleman's presumption reminds me of one perhaps as conclusive, but which Dickens tells us failed to satisfy his Mr. Bumble. That henpecked beadle is said to have said, on hearing of the legal presumption that a man's wife acts under his control: "If the law presumes anything of the sort, the law's a fool—a natural fool." If this permission of disallowance rests on a presumption that the legislation of our provinces is going to be unjust or unwise, it may be needed; but under that idea one might have done better either not to allow, or else to restrict within narrower limits, such legislation. If the promised non-exercise of the power to disallow rests on the presumption that all will be done justly and wisely in the provincial legislatures, the legislative power is well given; but then there is no need, on the other hand, for the permission to disallow.'

Dunkin, however, with this power of disallowance among other things in his mind, followed with the conclusion that there was 'no real autonomy allowed to the provinces', that 'disallowance of all autonomy to the provinces' characterized the scheme.¹ If that be conceded, the nature of Canadian government is that of a thinly veiled legislative union; and this position is difficult to maintain considering the history, the legal decisions, and the actual results worked out because of them.² It challenges the authority of provincial legislation, otherwise sound, and, it is submitted, it reopens the whole question of local government within any province. If it be correct, it is inevitable that the binding force of local regulations may be disputed on the principle delegatus non potest delegare. Provincial regulations of factories or of public health, for example, may well be called in question by the citizens of a province. And yet this 'big county council'³—this province—has the constitutional power to change its own constitution. The two things seem incompatible.

¹ Keith, Responsible Government, vol. i, p. 419.

The two well-defined divisions of the subjects seem to correspond to two well-defined periods in social development. The first might be called the period of growth. Material development and economic progress were the predominating social characteristics. With their foundations in progress, constitutional issues did not create vital and widespread interests, and much was often conceded, or allowed to go unchallenged, or was consented to 'against a day'. Thus the dominion government, with the strong bias lent to the federation by Sir John

¹ Confederation Debates, p. 502; Kennedy, op. cit., p. 661.

² Cf. Attorney-general for British Columbia to the federal minister of justice, December 20, 1901: 'In the early days of confederation the dominion executive appear to have been imbued with the notion that the relation between the dominion and the provinces was analogous to that existing between parent and child, and to have acted accordingly. That view of the status of the provinces has been overthrown by a series of imperial privy council decisions which have clearly established that the provinces acting within the scope of their powers are almost sovereign states' (Provincial Legislation, 1901-3 (Ottawa, 1905), p. 56).

³ Riddell, op. cit., p. 98.

Macdonald, acquired much actual power. But once the foundations of social progress became secure and economic expansion began to demand such wide securities as its exponents seemed to consider necessary, constitutional challenges became more and more common. The courts were forced to consider the constitution in all its bearings and to give such interpretations to it as were consistent with its construction as a whole. The second period is the period of provincial rights which have increased under judicial interpretations. These, however, have not violated the framework. Indeed it may be said that they have humanized the British North America Act. They have given it the elasticity of life. They have rescued it from the uncritical worship due to an imperishable and immutable relic of rigid antiquarianism. They, too, have contributed to political theory. In Canada are being worked out experiments in sovereignty. Or rather Canada is making a serious contribution to the destruction of the Austinian idea. Every province is from one point of view at least—in relation to the federal government—an example of a group with a life and purpose of its own. The history of education in the province of Manitoba is an interesting contribution to the decline and fall of the sovereign state.

Finally, there are two further distinctions between a federation and a confederation which have been made. They are not important, but need not be overlooked. Firstly, 'a federal state is one all parts of which are represented, for international purposes, by one government; and a confederation of states one whose governments retain the right to be separately represented and considered'.¹ Without discussing the definition it is obvious that, in so far as Canada is allowed international relations by the imperial tie, Canada is a federation. The dominion government acts for Canada as a whole in any international affairs, including those of the empire. Secondly, a federation is 'a union of component states, wherein there is a central legislature which has authority to pass laws directly obligatory upon the people, the component states also having legislative power. In confederations, on the other hand, the central body has relations with the component states only, and not directly with individuals, e. g. Austria-Hungary.'¹ The inference in relation to Canada is obvious. From another aspect we may accept Judge Clement's opinion of the nature of Canadian government: 'The true federal idea is clearly manifest, to recognize national unity with the right of local self-government; the very same idea that is stamped on the written constitution of the United States'.²

¹ Lewis, On the Use and Abuse of some Political Terms (ed. Raleigh, 1898), p. 97.

¹ Scott, The Canadian Constitution historically explained (1918), p. 3.

² Clement, The Law of the Canadian Constitution, p. 337.

CHAPTER XXIV

THE DISTRIBUTION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER

THE distribution of legislative power in Canada is governed by sections 91, 92, 93, and 95 of the British North America Act, 1867.¹ The first two deal with the general distribution of subjects between the federal and the provincial parliaments; the third with education, which nominally is in provincial hands; and the fourth with agriculture and immigration, over which there is concurrent jurisdiction.

No great constitutional difficulties have arisen in connexion with the interpretation of sections 93 and 95. The first division of section 93 is clear. The rights and privileges referred to are rights and privileges of denominational schools known to and recognized by the law as such. It cannot be construed to cover schools which were de facto denominational through such causes as the presence of a population professing one religion, or through the teaching of one faith.² The phrase 'class of persons' must be interpreted to mean persons distinguished as a class by religious belief and not by race or language. Persons joined by 'ties of faith' and no others alone 'form a class of persons within the meaning of the Act'.³ Of course, this subsection does not exclude all provincial legislation in relation to denominational schools legally constituted at the time of federation. As long as the rights and privileges existing at that time are preserved, provincial legislation is valid.

In subsections 3 and 4 appeals are allowed to the governor-general in council only on behalf of such denominational schools as had an existence in law at the time of federation. Such appeals are not confined to rights and privileges then existing, but they must be appeals from the protestant or Roman catholic minority 'in relation to education' and not 'with respect to denominational schools'. These two subsections constitute a substantial enactment and are not a mere provision for the enforcing of subsection 1.¹ They also lay down the only conditions under which the federal parliament can legislate in relation to education.²

¹ See Appendix.

² Maher v. Town of Portland, Wheeler, Confederation Law, pp. 362 ff.; City of Winnipeg v. Barrett, [1892] A. C. 445.

³ Ottawa Separate Schools v. Mackell, [1917] A. C. 62.

The only subjects over which there constitutionally exists concurrent legislation are agriculture and immigration. Both the dominion and the provinces can pass laws dealing with the scope of these matters, but the federal law will prevail in case the legislation clashes. For example, a province can legislate for purposes of encouraging immigration into it; but such legislation will be invalid in so far as it does not conform to the general immigration laws of Canada. There are obvious reasons for this. The dominion alone can supervise and grant citizenship. The responsibility lies on it also to take into consideration imperial treaties, the relationship between the different parts of the empire, and the susceptibilities of foreign states, all or any of which a provincial Act might affect. 'The right of entry into Canada of persons voluntarily seeking such entry is obviously a purely national matter, affecting as it does the relation of the empire with foreign states.'³

In attempting to deal with the legal interpretations of sections 91 and 92 there are certain obvious limitations. An exhaustive treatment would only be possible in a treatise on Canadian constitutional law. To note even cursorily each specifically enumerated power would involve such frequent reference to complicated cases and such detailed discussion of legal technicalities as to defeat the purpose of this book. It is possible, however, to consider under several headings methods of approach to the study and to keep them largely free from intricate phraseology. Within these limitations, such consideration will provide a general conception of the distribution of legislative power. It is possible, under six general headings, to outline some working principles of interpretation—(a) the distribution of power considered as a whole; (b) the federal ‘residuary power’; (c) the completeness of legislative power in Canada; (d) the general test of the validity of any Act; (e) the recognition of alternative aspects in the testing of such validity; (f) intrusion of federal legislation on provincial legislation, and vice versa. It must be remembered, however, that in constitutional cases the judicial committee of the privy council has refrained from making its opinions or dicta standards of interpretation, and has preferred to consider a particular case or point on its merits and apart from previous rulings. This method does not exclude the use of former decisions, but in avoiding the acceptance of them as generally binding, it has tended to eliminate rigidity and to promote elasticity of working.

¹ Brophy v. Attorney-General for Manitoba, [1895] A. C. 202.

² See above, p. 433, note 3.

³ Chamberlain to governor-general, January 22, 1901, Provincial Legislation, 1899-1901, p. 139. For coloured immigration, see Keith, Responsible Government, vol. ii, pp. 1075 ff.; Imperial Unity, pp. 190 ff.; War Government in the Dominions, pp. 314 ff.; Imperial War Conferences, 1917 and 1918, Parliamentary Papers. Cd. 8566, Cd. 9177.

(a) The distribution of power considered as a whole

We have already seen that the historical circumstances out of which the British North America Act arose prevented it from being as complete and logical an enactment as it might otherwise have been. There were many opposing forces at work—racial, linguistic, social, economic, geographical, and even sentimental—and the foundations of the federation could only be laid by such a balancing of these forces at the moment as would produce a general plan on which union might be formed. The result was a working agreement, and the triumph of the federal idea was not endangered by attempting anything like a balanced distribution of legislative power. The groups concerned in the political construction followed the wise course of being as general as possible, leaving the courts to round off the results of the conferences by decisions in actual concrete cases as they arose. Room was thus left for constitutional progress and for the development of a theory of constitutional law related as far as possible to the social and political growth of the people. The aim in 1867 was to frame as near as possible 'a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom', and in the generality of the language used the elasticity of the British constitution was fortunately preserved as far as the circumstances would permit. It is impossible to read even superficially the list of federal and provincial enumerated powers without seeing how they overlap and intertwine. This fact did not result from accident. It was rather the outcome of deliberations which sought general principles. The framers of the scheme knew that they were working on the terms of a political agreement which excluded the exact disjunction of a perfectly logical enactment, but, in addition, they deliberately avoided an attempt to be logical. The vast majority of them had learned a bitter enough lesson in constitutional experience, and they sought as much freedom from definition as was possible without wrecking the negotiations. The courts have recognized this purpose, and have confined themselves as a rule to the definite arguments before them, and avoided stereotyping the interpretation of each specific power. Their one guiding principle has already been pointed out—to read the Act as a statute, to consider it as a whole, to refuse to isolate clauses or to lend them anything of the solemnity belonging to inviolate instruments. They are members of a statutory body, deriving their constitutional vitality and functions from their organic unity in the body. Thus, for example, 'property and civil rights in the province' impinges on almost every other power in section 92 and on many in section 91. The object of interpretation is to read it as excluding cases dealt with elsewhere and not to take it in its widest and most comprehensive meaning. The general principle of interpretation is embodied in the following judgement: 'The structure of sections 91 and 92 and the degree to which the connotation of the expressions used overlap render it . . . unwise on this or any other occasion to attempt exhaustive definitions of the meaning and scope of these expressions. Such definitions in the case of language used under the conditions in which a constitution such as that under consideration was framed must almost certainly miscarry. It is in many cases only by confining decisions to concrete questions, which have actually arisen in circumstances the whole of which are before the tribunal, that injustice to future suitors can be avoided. . . . In discharging the difficult duty of arriving at a reasonable and practicable construction of the language of the sections, so as to reconcile the respective powers they contain and give effect to them all, it is the wise course to decide each case which arises without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the statute than is necessary for the decision of the particular question in hand. The wisdom of adhering to this rule appears to their lordships to be of especial importance when putting a construction on the scope of the words "civil rights" in particular cases. An abstract logical definition of their scope is not only, having regard to the context of the 91st and 92nd sections of the Act, impracticable, but it is certain, if attempted, to cause embarrassment and possible injustice in future cases.'¹

The Act contemplates a fourfold scheme of division: (1) education; (2) agriculture and immigration, already dealt with; (3) subjects assigned exclusively to the dominion; (4) subjects assigned exclusively to the provinces. In the third division the dominion is given a general power to legislate for federal interests outside the exclusive powers granted to the provinces in the fourth division. To make this third division of legislative power more certain, the dominion has exclusive power over twenty-nine enumerated subjects 'notwithstanding anything in the Act'. This enumeration does not restrict the general power granted to the dominion over subjects not exclusively assigned to the provinces. The idea is that none of these twenty-nine enumerated subjects shall be considered as within any of the enumerated spheres of provincial legislative authority. The fourth division includes fifteen enumerated subjects assigned exclusively to the provinces and a general exclusive provincial power over non-enumerated matters of a purely local or private nature. The idea is to rule out the conclusion that the fifteen enumerated subjects exhaust all subjects assigned to the provincial legislatures.

¹ The John Deere Plough Company v. Wharton, [1915] A. C. 330.

The general character of the federal legislative power is that of an attempt to distinguish the matters of great national interest from those local or provincial. The interests of Canada in the widest sense are differentiated from the interests of the provinces in the widest sense. This general character is obvious. When once the federal interest and importance of a subject are constitutionally established, the power of the dominion is exclusive and makes invalid any provincial legislation on the subject, even though the dominion has not itself legislated.

The general character of the provincial legislative power is seen in the grant of general local authority, and the enumerated subjects in section 92 are included as belonging to that local sphere. The dominion cannot encroach on these subjects except in so far as such legislation is incidental to the exercise of the legislative power in relation to the enumerated subjects of section 91. Nor can a province encroach on the enumerated subjects of section 91, pleading that the matter is local. Provincial legislation must be confined to education, to agriculture and immigration, as already pointed out, and to such subjects as are constitutionally decided to belong to the general and particular enumeration of section 92.

(b) The federal 'residuary power'

It is possible to get the so-called 'residuary power' of the dominion free from the rather vague conceptions which have passed into currency. There is a general power given to the federal legislature 'to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces'. This power is not a complete grant to the dominion of the residuum of undefined and unenumerated powers in Canada. To the provinces is also granted a residuum of undefined power. They have the exclusive right to legislate generally on all unenumerated matters of a local or private provincial nature. The federal residuary power is thus curtailed by the provincial residuary power, and can de jure be exercised only when the interests of Canada as a whole are clearly involved. In other words, when the federal legislature legislates on any subject outside the twenty-nine enumerated subjects of section 91, it can claim no power from that section to legislate on any subject which is in essence or scope local or provincial. Everything local is given exclusively to a province, whether specifically or generally, and the dominion cannot a priori assume that its residuary power allows it to interpret things substantially local in dominion terms. The federal legislative power can only be called into action outside the enumerated subjects over which it has exclusive authority, when the particular matter on which it is exercised lies outside the specific and general powers granted to a province. Of course, a matter may originate locally, like a hydro-electric scheme, continue for a time of local importance, and gradually assume national interest and import. When such a condition is constitutionally established, the dominion can legislate and can override provincial legislation, if there is a clash. The dominion, too, may, under its residuary power, incidentally interfere with a purely local matter. For example, the power 'to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada' must almost inevitably affect provincial control over 'property and civil rights'. But in actual substantial legislation the dominion must establish the validity of the formula 'something done for the dominion in the interests of the dominion'.¹

(c) The completeness of legislative power in Canada

There is no sphere of legislation dealing with the internal affairs of Canada which is not covered by the distribution of legislative power in the British North America Act of 1867. Broadly speaking, 'the whole area of self-government' is covered in the grants of legislative power to the federal and provincial parliaments.² The point is of interest in comparative politics. There is no residuum of power, granted neither to the dominion nor to the provinces, but reserved to the people as in the constitution of the United States. All matters subject to legislation, in so far as compatible with Canada's place in the empire, belong to the Canadian legislatures, whether federal or provincial.³ The general formula is—if the subject-matter is not provincial it is federal, and vice versa. To legislate by initiative

¹ Lord Haldane in Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Alberta (Insurance Companies Case), [1916] A. C. 588.

² Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada (Supreme Court References Case), [1912] A. C. 571. Cf., however, Lord Haldane, in Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1914] A. C. 153: 'It is not an expression which you must ride to death . . . there are some things that are not delegated with regard to succession to the crown and matters of that kind.'

³ Bank of Toronto v. Lambe, 12 App. Cases, 575. Of course, one legislature need not possess power to legislate wholly on a specific subject. Concurrent legislation by the provinces, or by the dominion and provinces, might be necessary. Cf. Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Ottawa Fire Insurance Co., [1907] 39 S. C. R. 405.

and referendum would seem to be beyond the federal or provincial powers.¹

(d) The general test of the validity of any Act

It is now possible to outline certain leading questions which may be asked regarding a doubtful Act in order to begin the making of a decision on its validity. If the Act has been passed by the federal legislature, the first question is, Does the Act in question deal substantially with any of those subjects exclusively assigned to the provinces? If the answer is in the affirmative, a further question arises, Does not the Act deal with some matter which may fall within some of the exclusive and enumerated powers granted to the dominion? If the Act does not fall within the subjects granted specifically or generally to the provinces there is no further dispute.

Similar questions guide the approach to the discussion of a doubtful provincial Act. Does the Act fail to come within the specific or general provincial powers? If it does, it is obviously invalid. But if the answer is that apparently it satisfies the conditions, then the additional question must be asked, Does it not touch substantially on some of the enumerated powers granted exclusively to the dominion? If it does it is ultra vires, for, in spite of its apparent inclusion in the provincial sphere, the dominion power over its enumerated subjects is exclusive 'notwithstanding anything in this Act'.

(e) The recognition of alternative aspects in the testing of the validity of an Act

It has been pointed out that sections 91 and 92 overlap. The courts have originated dicta which help in this connexion. The subject-matter of an Act might, from one point of view, come within the legislative scope of section 91, and from another aspect it might belong to the legislative scope of section 92.

¹ See above, p. 392.

For example, a province might legislate on a matter relying on its control over 'property and civil rights in the province', while the dominion, looking from an entirely different angle, might legislate on the same matter relying on its control over 'trade and commerce'. If the dispute reaches the courts an important fact arises from this difference of point of view. We have seen that the courts are not concerned with the motive of legislation;¹ but in such a case as that under consideration they must consider the nature, the grounds of the legislation, in order to establish the authority or lack of authority of the Act. Its object and scope must be determined in order to ascertain the class of subject to which it really belongs.² The courts can determine the classification of the subject-matter of an Act by considering its main purpose. For example, they might be called on to decide whether a specific Act was legislation under the provincial power over licences, or whether it was an invasion of the federal sphere of taxation and 'virtually a stamp Act'.³ Once the decision is made, the motive for legislation cannot hurt the validity of the Act. The courts, by deciding the point of view or aspect of an Act which may make it valid or invalid federal or provincial legislation, must consider the influences moving the legislature which enacted it. Their consideration is, however, only auxiliary to a constitutional decision and is not the passing of a judgement on the motive behind such legislation. This matter of 'point of view' has been summed up recently by the judicial committee of the privy council: 'It must be borne in mind in construing the two sections, that matters which in a special aspect and for a particular purpose may fall within one of them may in a different aspect and for a different purpose fall within the other. In such cases, the nature and scope of the legislative attempt of the dominion or the province, as the case may be, have to be examined with reference to the actual facts if it is to be possible to determine under which set of powers it falls in substance and in reality. This may not be difficult to determine in actual and concrete cases. But it may well be impossible to give abstract answers to general questions as to the meaning of the words or to lay down any interpretation based on their literal scope apart from their context.’¹

¹ See above, p. 428.

² Russell v. The Queen, [1882] 7 App. Cas. 829.

³ Attorney-General for Quebec v. Queen Insurance Company, [1878] 3 App. Cas. 1090. Cf. Lord Watson in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion, [1896] A. C. 348.

(f) Intrusion of federal legislation on provincial legislation and vice versa

It does not invalidate a federal Act if it interferes with the operation of a provincial Act, provided that it is not substantial legislation on a matter belonging to the exclusive jurisdiction of the province. For example, the dominion could impose a liquor prohibition law, though in doing so it might destroy a perfectly valid provincial source of revenue in saloon and tavern licences. Or the dominion may directly intrude on the provincial area when legislating under its own clearly defined powers in so far as a general law may affect that area; or indirectly, with such provisions as may prevent a federal law from becoming a dead letter. It is, however, impossible to find any general formula which will govern dominion intrusion. All that can be said is that there is a kind of enabling power of an intrusive nature sometimes necessary to the workings of dominion legislation. ‘Necessarily incidental’ has become a recognized phrase in this connexion.² It appears, however, that the phrase must not be exclusively interpreted as meaning that without the intrusion under consideration it would be impossible to work the dominion Act, or that no other provision would be adequate. ‘On the contrary, it seems that if such provision might under certain circumstances be beneficial, and assist to more fully enforce such legislation, then it must, at all events, on an appeal to the courts, be held to be necessary, that is, necessary in certain events.'¹

¹ The John Deere Plough Company v. Wharton, [1915] A. C. 330.

² Montreal Street Railway Company v. City of Montreal, [1912] A. C. 333; Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion, [1896] A. C. 348.

The provinces do not seem to have any powers to bring in auxiliary legislation in relation to the enumerated subjects granted exclusively to the federal legislature, though in legislating upon subjects, properly understood, within their own sphere, they may touch on the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal parliament. On the other hand, it seems probable that they might incidentally invade the area of the dominion residuary power.

[AUTHORITIES.—The leading books on the subject are J. R. Cartwright, Cases decided on the British North America Act (Toronto, 1887 ff.) ; E. R. Cameron, The Canadian Constitution as interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in its Judgements (Winnipeg, 1915) (there is an important review of this book in Review of Historical Publications relating to Canada, vol. xx, pp. 198 ff.) ; A. H. F. Lefroy, Canada's Federal System (Toronto, 1913), Legislative Power in Canada (Toronto, 1897–8), Short Treatise on Canadian Constitutional Law (Toronto, 1918) ; W. H. P. Clement, The Law of the Canadian Constitution (3rd ed., Toronto, 1916). There are valuable chapters in Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions, vol. ii, pp. 645 ff. (Oxford, 1912) ; Imperial Unity, pp. 389 ff. (Oxford, 1916) ; War Government in the Dominions, pp. 289 ff. (Oxford, 1921). The Law Reports of the various provinces, the Supreme Court of Canada Reports, The Times Law Reports, Correspondence and Reports of the Ministers of Justice and Orders in Council upon the subject of Dominion and Provincial Legislation are essentials. The Canada Law Journal and the Canadian Law Times contain valuable articles and comments on cases. On the school question, consult O. D. Skelton, Sir Wilfrid Laurier (2 vols., Oxford, 1921) ; J. Willison, Sir W. Laurier and the Liberal Party (2 vols., Toronto, 1903) ; G. M. Weir, Separate School Law in the Prairie Provinces (Queen's University, Kingston, 1918).]

¹ Doyle v. Bell (1884), 11 O. A. R. 326 ; City of Toronto v Canadian Pacific Railway Company, [1908] A. C. 54.

CHAPTER XXV

THE IMPERIAL TIE

THE dominion of Canada is an integral part of the British Empire. The growth of Canadian autonomy has therefore been necessarily limited by the legal and constitutional bonds which unite Canada to the empire. In the past the imperial governments and not a few Canadians thought that there should be as little devolution of authority as possible lest the empire should finally dissolve. Even with the grant of responsible government, development was slow, but, as we have seen, there has been a steady and continuous shedding of imperial control in many of those spheres which were once considered sacred and inviolate, until at present the imperial tie is so far removed from the ordinary everyday affairs of citizenship that there is a disposition to think that it consists merely in loyalty to ideals of freedom.

There can be little doubt that emotion and sentiment play a large and important part in the relationship between Canada and Great Britain, and it is well that moral values should not be forgotten in the consideration of hard, legal facts. Great Britain recognizes that Canada has a distinct national status and a distinct group life. There is no possibility in future of leaving Canadian opinion unconsidered or of curtailing full discussion in the delicate and dangerous world of foreign affairs. Great Britain has accepted the fullness of Canadian citizenship, and if it still lacks an effective voice in the executive life of the empire, the fault assuredly does not lie with the mother country. Constitutional reorganization lies in the hands of the Canadian people. In the meantime, the secret places of imperial policy have been opened to Canadian statesmen, who can obtain as impartial and complete a knowledge of international affairs, of defence, of treaties, and of conventions as any member of the British cabinet. There thus exists a real Canadian influence which need no longer be exercised through irregular and uncertain consultations, but possesses a recognized sphere in the active co-operation at any moment between the imperial government and a Canadian minister resident in London. The motive behind all these advances has undoubtedly been a devotion to freedom in the broadest sense.

But the student of constitutional history, while fully recognizing the value of such devotion and the strength of the emotional ties, cannot forget the world of law nor lose sight of those conditions which constitute international life. Although Canadian autonomy is practically complete in trade and commerce, although Canadian opinion is practically decisive in political treaties affecting the dominion alone, although Canada is a distinct member of the league of nations with the right to representation on its council, yet the witness which these developments bear is rather to the extreme limit of Canadian freedom within the empire than to newly accepted positions in constitutional law. As the law of nations now stands Canada is not a sovereign state. However light the imperial tie, as long as it exists Canada cannot escape—under the political theories which at present prevail—the implications of the fact. In addition, the imperial connexion imposes boundaries on Canadian autonomy within the empire. The internal and the external limitations of Canadian political authority can be clearly stated in terms of private and international law without in the least mortgaging the future or closing the gate to further developments. There is just as great a danger in refusing to recognize the fact of these limitations as in erecting the present regulations governing foreign relationships into permanent and inviolate principles and thus laying the dead hand of theory on the march of political events. It is necessary to avoid, on the one hand, an exaggeration of Canadian status at the expense of accepted conventions, and on the other a magnification of current theory into immutable law at the expense of hoisting Canada on the horns of ugly dilemmas.

The constitutional situation is unparalleled in history, and analogies drawn from Hanover or the Thirteen Colonies are like most political analogies barren of guidance. It is possible to say the same of the phrases which attempt to describe the conditions. 'Autonomous nations of the British commonwealth', 'the league of Britannic nations', 'the free states of the Empire' are terms capable of such complicated connotations, and are all linked with such varied political theories that none of them is conclusive. All that the historian or political thinker can hope to do is to look at things as they actually are. He must see facts and their implications: first, that Canada is an integral part of the empire; secondly, that Canada does not possess those adjuncts of political life which determine recognition as a state; thirdly, that Canada has a distinct social, economic, and political group activity peculiarly and separately Canadian; and, fourthly, that the generally accepted theory of sovereignty darkens the issues, and that its abandonment will furnish the most necessary step in resolving the antinomies. Finally, he must recognize that political progress is best secured where the forms which give constitutions their concrete expression are behind rather than in front of general political education. To build up a future on historical experience is always foolhardy, but it can be used as a handmaiden, a humble servant—to be dismissed or employed at discretion. And if there is one historical generalization which possesses any modicum of validity it is that which appears to prove that political development has met with its greatest triumphs when it has been content to march in the rear rather than in the advance-guard of the human army. At the same time, recognition of this fact, if such it be, need not eliminate sane discussion and serious study, while it will serve to emphasize the truth that human relationships are neither constant nor logical.

Canada is a dominion 'under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland'. Such is the preamble of the Canadian constitution granted by the imperial parliament, and it is a fundamental condition on which Canadian executive, legislative, and judicial authority exists. This fact is of more than academic importance. During a discussion in the imperial parliament on Irish affairs Mr. Bonar Law declared, 'If the self-governing dominions chose to say "To-morrow we will no longer make a part of the British empire", we would not try to force them. Dominion home rule means the right to decide their own destinies.' Mr. Law's words need examination, and it is not without significance that during the same debates Mr. Lloyd George was careful to avoid the question of secession, and that on March 2, 1922, Mr. Winston Churchill during the committee stage of the Irish Free State bill refused on behalf of the government an amendment giving the power. He declared that the dominions had never claimed nor had Great Britain ever admitted the right of secession. Mr. Law's phrase is capable of only one valid construction. If Canada expressed in unmistakable terms the desire of its people to sever the imperial tie, the British government would not attempt to resist by the armed forces of the crown such a clearly expressed wish. But, as General Smuts clearly recognized for South Africa, Canada could not dissolve its connexion with the empire by a federal Act of parliament, because the crown has not the constitutional power to assent to a Canadian Act outside the legislative competence of the dominion legislature. Canada has authority to legislate for 'the peace, order, and good government of Canada', and to pass an Act dissolving the dominion as 'under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland' would be extra-territorial legislation of an extreme form and of undoubted invalidity. The constitutional dependence of Canada on the imperial crown can only be constitutionally abrogated by an Act of the imperial parliament, and the announcement of Canada's severance from the empire could only take place by imperial and not by federal legislation. Indeed the league of nations itself confirms this opinion. Canada has a separate status within the league, but contingent on its position as a constituent part of the British empire, and the covenant binds Canada with other members of the empire to preserve the territorial integrity of the empire. There thus emerges another fact, that in addition to an imperial Act being the normal constitutional method of dissolving the relationship there would be also necessary agreement on the part of the other constituent members of the empire, otherwise the covenant is futile and meaningless. The league of nations in giving Canada a new position at the same time binds it closer to the imperial crown. It is in this connexion that the office of governor-general must in future be viewed. His constitutional functions are now clear, but there has arisen an opinion that since the Canadian government has secured the right of direct correspondence with the British prime minister, the office is a useless and expensive relic of an effete system. It has been suggested that the chief justice could carry out the necessary and formal duties. Canada could of course make new arrangements which would satisfy the constitutional conditions, but the governor-general is something more than a mere cog in a political machine. The crown is the most abiding link of empire, and it is not derogatory to Canadian status that the formal functions of the crown in Canada should be combined with something of the visible dignity which still surrounds the throne in England. The imperial tie raises the further question whether the imperial parliament can pass legislation applying to Canada. All along there has existed a tendency to curtail such legislation, but with the developments of recent years a claim has been made, and concurred in by Sir Robert Borden, that the sovereign legislative power of the imperial parliament is not only obsolete but invalid. The most probable opinion is that in future no imperial legislation will bind Canada unless concurred in by resolution of the federal parliament. In addition, if Canadian proposals mature to obtain from the imperial parliament powers to confer extra-territorial effect for federal legislation similar to that belonging to imperial legislation, there will be less necessity for the exercise of legislative power for the empire as a whole, although imperial legislation would of necessity apply to Canadians as to other British subjects resident where the crown possesses extra-territorial jurisdiction. The question, however, has another aspect of vital importance. Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and Newfoundland enjoy wide freedom to change their constitutions, but Canada has no authority either to alter the distribution of legislative powers or to vary the essential form of government—a fact upon which Mr. Mackenzie King relied in deprecating Mr. Rowell's claim that equality with the United Kingdom had been established and recognized. All changes made in the constitution of 1867, other than those of small detail, have required imperial legislation. The formation of the federation has been treated as a covenanted occasion, and explicit recognition was given to this treatment in 1907 by the cabinets of the United Kingdom and of Canada, when admission was made that the general assent of the provinces was necessary to any constitutional changes. Canada is thus dependent on the imperial parliament for any important alterations in the instrument of government. The problem is one of difficulty. Imperial legislation would undoubtedly be refused were there signs of serious provincial opposition. On the other hand, it would be difficult to get general provincial agreement to any increase of the federal powers. The provinces are extremely suspicious of proposals which might appear to narrow their own legislative spheres. In Quebec this is further complicated by fears that the special linguistic and religious rights of the province might be endangered, if the dominion were granted a general authority to alter the constitution. Suggestions are abroad for change, and the imperial government will be brought sooner or later face to face with a position of extreme delicacy in deciding how far one province, for example, might be allowed to stand in the way of constitutional proposals which would eliminate the necessity of appeal to the imperial legislature. As things stand at present only non-contentious changes are likely to be conceded. It is difficult to see any conditions which would command general approval. The present position is an undoubted and serious curtailment of Canadian autonomy. On the other hand, it is impossible to overlook the fact that there exists a public opinion on the matter in Canada strong enough to perpetuate this important limitation. Doubtless the peculiar religious and racial groupings in Canadian federalism complicate the situation, but the fact remains, and should not be forgotten by those who urge a more regularized synthesis of empire, that within Canada itself there exists such strong opposition to constitutional change as to narrow severely the sphere of local self-government.

In foreign affairs Canada's connexion with the empire imposes obvious legal boundaries. In spite of all the phrases which have passed into currency Canada has no international status. Even the treaties which Canada concludes in matters of trade and commerce acquire their force through the imperial relationship. Canada cannot negotiate directly with a foreign country in the political or any other important sphere. If negotiations are necessary or called for, or Canada is vitally interested, the crown will act on ministerial advice with the consent of the Canadian government. In minor matters direct communication has taken place for many years, but the imperial government must learn of serious matters through the governor-general and through the British ambassador resident in the particular country. It is true that normally Canadian negotiators will be employed, but if a treaty supervenes it will be considered for international purposes an imperial treaty, and it will take such a form as to leave its nature unambiguous and beyond doubt. The informal agreements which Canada has concluded, and to which reference has been made, are of no international value, and neither the Canadian governments nor the foreign states have mistaken their character. Indeed in the arrangements for a Canadian minister plenipotentiary at Washington the diplomatic unity of the empire has been expressly preserved. While the appointment will be made on the advice of the dominion cabinet the responsibility and authority will rest with the imperial government and the full powers granted to the minister will be issued on the responsibility of the imperial foreign secretary.

When the developments of recent years are judicially examined, they prove that Canada's status in international law has undergone no fundamental change. The war cabinet was merely consultative and had no collective executive responsibility for the empire. Canada signed the peace treaty under authority from the crown acting on advice from the secretary of state for foreign affairs. Canada's position in the league of nations is due to its position in the empire. The covenant of the league has undoubtedly imposed on Canada new obligations of an international nature, but has given it no distinct international status. A possible declaration of war will best illustrate the exact state of affairs. Once the imperial government declares war, Canada is at war, and once a foreign state declares war against Great Britain, Canada is at war.¹

¹ Statements have been made (by Mr. Lloyd George, for example) that such and such treaties do not, or would not, bind Canada unless accepted by resolution of the federal parliament. These have led to the superficial conclusion that in the absence of such resolution, Canada could not be drawn into a war which might arise out of such treaties. The difficulty, however, lies in the fact that an enemy would not accept the modus vivendi of the imperial 'family compact' and would consider Canada as an enemy owing to its integral connexion in international law with the British empire.

In either case, Canada need not fight, need not supply a man or a ship or assist in any way. Canada might be prepared to preserve the most meticulous neutrality, but as international law now stands, Canada would be at war, and its territory and citizens liable to attack. The problem assumes an acute form. In future there will be full consultation on foreign affairs, and indications point to developments along the lines of the imperial defence committee. It is no longer possible for the imperial government to carry on the foreign relations of the empire without Canadian assistance. That much is absolutely clear. And it is also clear that as the empire is at present constituted, Canada cannot escape—consultation or no consultation—the implications of its connexion with the empire, and must accept the fact of being at least in a state of war when Great Britain is at war. On the other hand, it is possible for Canada to acquire an effective voice in foreign policy and in war if the Canadian people so desire. But the acquisition of such a regularized position would not affect Canada's international status. Canada's voice, effective and regularized, might be cast against a particular policy which resulted in war, or against a particular war itself, but under the international laws which hold good in the current theory of sovereignty neither fact would prevent the foreign power or powers concerned from exercising their perfectly legal right of invading the dominion, of killing Canadian citizens, and of injuring Great Britain through military and naval action against the empire as a whole. The most careful explanation of Canada's previous attitude would not change the situation in any degree, nor would it make illegal any such actions as those suggested on the part of the foreign power. It may be that in the league of nations there is, for imperial problems, distinct hope. No one can seriously doubt that at present Canada is not enamoured of constitutional changes. Mr. Meighen avoided the issue at the general election of 1921, and his successful opponent is inclined to follow the Laurier tradition. Canada's membership of the league is likely to remain, and it is clear that the functions most vital to the permanence and justification of the league will be discharged in those spheres of foreign affairs and war and peace in which the present organization of the empire seems most anomalous. In other words, if the league of nations succeeds, Canada can afford to let its position await the guidance of the years. On the other hand, the international difficulties still remain linked with older conceptions of the state.

At this point, it may be pertinent to deal with the theoretical difficulty which for many minds prevents a just appreciation of the present position of Canada in the empire. We have pointed out certain anomalies in this position, but we must not on that account be regarded as enforcing the old view that political sovereignty by its very nature is one and indivisible, or that the logic of the situation leaves Canada with the alternatives of complete independence or permanent inferiority of status. The older doctrine of sovereignty admitted no third course, but the active criticism of recent political thought working on such material as modern federations, leagues, and unions so abundantly provide, rejects that absolutism. No ancient formula of sovereignty, however embodied in present legal doctrines, can stay the actual process of political development. If the formula declares that there must be one single ultimate residence of all sovereign powers within a state, and the facts reveal a dual or multiple residence, so much the worse for the formula. Supposing the Austinian doctrine of sovereignty had been rigidly accepted in the past, what a barrier it would have placed in the way of modern federalism within and without the British empire! Or supposing on the other hand the Montesquieuan doctrine of the separate embodiment of the 'powers' had been as faithfully adhered to as the New Hampshire Bill of Rights demanded, how could the typical institution of the cabinet system ever have developed ? Necessity modifies our over-simple or over-rigid theories. The strong persuasions of defence or finance, making for unity, have countered the tenacious differences of religion or race, and have created thus not only new forms but new degrees of sovereignty. We must therefore make our theory of sovereignty conformable to these facts. The modern state is an attempt to reconcile our experiences and our necessities, and the modern theory of the state must seek to do no less.

The changing relation of Canada to the British empire, therefore, instead of flouting any eternal principle of political sovereignty, is one of the crucial series of data to which our theories of sovereignty must conform. It is not too much to say that, in the modern political world, we find states showing every degree of the integration and the separation of sovereign powers. If the constitutions of the United States and of Australia formally allocate residual sovereignty to the participant states, while in the dominion of Canada this pertains to the federal government, both are nevertheless forms within which the unity of a state is realized. If Australia assigns a variety of concurrent powers to the states and to the federation, the system nevertheless is a working unity. If the Union of South Africa is to be called a unitary state rather than a federation, it still presents a very different type of unity from that of the United Kingdom. We might go farther and suggest that, even in the so-called unitary state, whatever its legal form, there are sovereign powers which in fact are and must be exercised by municipalities, counties, and other units of administration. Why then, we may well ask, should not the British empire remain a unity although the aspirations of its parts for autonomy find the completest expression they may desire ?

In fact it is the insistence of the older doctrine of sovereignty, one exclusive and indivisible, which is the great stumbling-block in the way of the evolution of the greater unities which political exigencies, as distinct from political dogma, require to-day. Thus the league of nations can grow into an effective reality only if the conception of the exclusive state, discredited by the facts of interdependence, is abandoned also in the practice of statesmanship. In the last resort absolute power is a mystic doctrine which has relevance neither to men nor to states. Instead of the fiction of absolute sovereignty, owning no obligations 'except', as the old writers put it, 'to God', we must be content with the reality of relative autonomy, which alone provides, for men and for states, the condition of effective liberty and sane relationship. A clear recognition of this truth would remove the intellectual obstacle to the evolution of the unity of the British empire as well. To insist, for example, on the legalist principle of the ultimate appeal to an overlord sovereignty, should a constituent part of the empire oppose it, would be the way to lose the substance for the sake of the shadow. If the British government in 1900 had insisted on its view, against the opinion of Australia, that the right of appeal to the privy council should always lie in cases affecting the judicial interpretation of the federal principle, the unity of Australia within the empire would certainly have been not strengthened but weakened.

It will be said by the legalists that there is no political unity where there is no final authority. In reply, two observations may be made. In the first place we should notice the significance of the system which has grown up, particularly in federal states, by which the settlement of constitutional problems, where there is a question of conflicting claims to sovereign powers, is assigned not to parliament but to courts. In other words, these problems are regarded as subjects for interpretation and not for legislation, for adjustment and not for enactment, and the court in such a case may perhaps be fairly regarded as the representative, not of the parliamentary sovereign but of that more profound though less coherent will, the will of the people itself. This leads us to the further and fundamental consideration that the final unity of any state is to be sought not within the form of government at all, but in the consensus of political opinion, in the communal will which sets up and pulls down the instruments of political power. If there is that underlying unity it can support the gradation and division of ostensible sovereignty. A house divided against itself cannot stand, but if there is a common foundation it will sustain, without danger of their falling asunder, the divisions within the house.

We need not therefore despair of the unity of the British empire because Canada and its other constituents as they attain to political manhood claim a political sovereignty of their own, nor, on the other hand, need we think it necessary to construct, in advance of evolution, artificial props such as an imperial cabinet with definite overruling powers. What is best and safest is to strengthen the foundations of the common will, to cultivate the common heritage, to develop the intercourse between the members of the far-flung empire as well as between the responsible ministers of every part, to enhance in a word that sense of unity which the possession of a great and common tradition has built up in our history and in our faith. And if the resulting development contradicts fond theories of sovereignty, these may be offered up, in thankfulness for the unity maintained and achieved, as a cheerful and willing sacrifice.

In conclusion, it is necessary to lay emphasis on an important consideration. No amount of 'regularizing' or of constitutional changes will in the final analysis hold the empire together or guarantee imperial unity, apart from political development. We must not be swept off our feet by problems, by dilemmas, by political antinomies and all the stock-in-trade of theorists and of doctrinaires. The plain issue is this: progress implies conscious intelligent consent, and until that comes the greatest contribution to the empire will be a studied avoidance of plans and of constitutions. Canada knows well the situation, and that it cannot be squared with all the current rules. Reiterations of the apparent dangers involved do not help political education and are barren of results. For the present it is well to hold back from concrete proposals. The greatest solvent of political problems, if they are to be solved at all adequately, is time. The greatest danger lies in hastening the harvest of the years and in attempting to reap in advance of general political development. It may be that as time bites into the problem of empire and provides perhaps a legal issue, the world itself will have arrived at a higher synthesis of human endeavour than that represented by the hideous clash of modern sovereignties. Thus the history, which began with a glimpse into a paternal and conservative past, closes with the outlook of a democratic and liberal hope.

PART II
1922-1937

CHAPTER XXVI

TENDENCIES IN CANADIAN ADMINISTRATION

A SURVEY, however general, of Canadian constitutional law would be singularly out of proportion were some attention not drawn to the law relating to the administration.¹ Many activities of Canadian governments, both in the federal and provincial fields are to-day carried on by administrative authorities, such as ministers, boards, commissions, and other agencies, which have been granted wide powers to regulate at many points the lives of citizens. Canada shares in these developments along with other nations; but it is worth while to draw attention to this modern aspect of government in its particular application to Canada, if a living picture of the workings of constitutional law is to emerge.

Any discussion of administrative law falls naturally into two parts: (i) the delegation of the power to legislate, and (ii) the delegation of powers to adjudicate. To define the terms legislative, judicial, and administrative is a task which I would prefer to avoid. In this chapter the terms will be used largely in their popular sense. Proceeding along the lines thus indicated, I shall discuss first the legislative point of view and then the judicial point of view.

The common reasons for the increased delegation of legislative powers to ministers and others exercising administrative functions have nowhere been discussed more adequately than in Mr. C. T. Carr's admirable analysis.² The reasons which he gives are applicable to Canada, and may be summarized as follows: (a) the great demands made on the time of parliament

¹ Cf. W. I. Jennings, The Law and the Constitution, ch. vi (London, 1933).

² Delegated Legislation, especially ch. iii (Cambridge, 1921).

by modern social and international problems; (b) the limitation in aptitude of a miscellaneous assembly such as parliament is to-day; (c) the occurrence of conditions which do not reach the gravity of an emergency, but yet require immediate attention at a time when parliament is not in session or is otherwise incapable of giving immediate attention to the problem. To these may be added a fourth reason given by Sir Josiah Stamp, namely, a desire to avoid the crippling of a vital scheme by reason of political feeling.¹ All these reasons apply in all Canadian jurisdictions, as no doubt they do, more or less, in all jurisdictions which are governed by parliamentary institutions possessing traditions akin to those of the United Kingdom. In addition to these circumstances, Canada is faced with certain problems of a peculiarly Canadian character. In the first place Canada is relatively a very young country. It lacks those facilities for research which are becoming more and more necessary as a condition precedent to effective legislation. In the past these deficiencies have been qualified by our ability to copy (in some cases almost verbatim²) the legislation of Great Britain and the United States. However, when the legislatures of these countries began to turn to the device of delegating their powers and then permitting administrative regulations dealing with particular situations in more intimate fashion, we were deprived of a ready-made source of information. Much more important than this fact, however, is the growing conviction in Canada that the development of new industries, natural resources, colonization, transportation, communications, due to the vastness of the country, and the unremunerative character of these enterprises and undertakings in their early stages, imposes an obligation on the governments to aid and to supervise. Government intervention predicates increased legislation, and necessarily, under modern conditions, delegated legislation. Finally, it is submitted that our parliamentary system of government in Canada has undergone a fundamental change with the modern development of cabinet government. Parliament itself emerged as a mechanism or device intended to control and supervise the executive. In course of time, with the development of the party system, it has become in reality a forum for the expression of opinion controlled by the demands of loyalty to a party. Even in those instances where parliament scrutinizes and approves every clause of a bill of general application, the legislation has been drafted and introduced by the executive. The psychological effect of this tendency has been doubtlessly to increase the prestige and responsibility of the executive and to lessen the importance of the private member in the mind of the citizen. The private member is in parliament to give expression in some degree to the views of his constituents rather than to initiate legislation. At any rate, whether a member of the party in power or in opposition, he is in a large measure merely a supporter of the party platform. The increased responsibility of the government calls for increased powers to meet new conditions that arise. We have therefore numerous causes in Canada all combining to transfer more legislative authority to the executive, and to strengthen the claims of the executive in its demand for greater powers.

¹ Journal of Public Administration (1924), at p. 26.

² Cf. Canadian trade union legislation; Canadian combines legislation; The Ontario Judicature Act; Married Women's Property Acts of the various provinces.

We turn to examine some of the instances of delegated legislative power in Canada:

(i) In many cases the legislatures have approved both the principle of the legislation and its leading features, but because of technical difficulties it is found advisable to leave to the cabinets the proclamation or extension of the legislation. Numerous examples may be found where statutes provide that an Act is to come into force on a day to be named by the governor or lieutenant-governor by proclamation. This procedure is well established: it has received judicial approval in

Regina v. Burah,¹ and there would appear to be little objection to this form of delegation since it is primarily a matter of convenience. The device is also a common form for the introduction of legislation implementing bilateral treaties.²

(ii) The power to appoint officers to administer an act is of common occurrence. This power has always been regarded as of executive quality, and has been criticized only by party supporters in so far as it professes to remove the appointment of administrators from the realm of politics and to delegate the right of appointment to civil service commissions or boards, who would in theory choose officials on the basis of merit and ability rather than of political affiliations. Whether civil service commissions have eliminated the abuses of the patronage system is a matter which is beyond the scope of the present discussion.

(iii) The power to lay down rules of practice and procedure and to prescribe the necessary forms is now delegated to administrative authorities almost as a matter of course. At first sight this power may seem to be of slight importance. However, it is well in this connexion to remember Sir Henry Maine's statement that substantive law is often concealed in the interstices of procedure. The question of procedure will be discussed more fully when we deal with the judicial aspect of the problem. For our present purposes it is sufficient to point out that objection is often taken to the procedure of administrative tribunals on the ground that the parties are not given a reasonable opportunity of presenting their case or of rebutting evidence detrimental to them. If the terms of the enabling Act are wide enough it may be possible to prescribe rules of procedure which affect materially the rights of the subject. Furthermore, even in prescribing the forms that are to be used there is a possibility that hardship may be caused. Thus in *Dyson v. Attorney-General*¹ the commissioners of inland revenue required that persons liable to pay income-taxes should complete a very elaborate form. It was necessary for the plaintiff in this case to appeal to the courts for a declaration of his rights. Other cases of a similar nature show that this is not an isolated instance.

¹ (1878) 3 App. Cas. 889. Cf. Hodge v. The Queen, (1884) 9 App. Cas. 117; Powell v. Apollo Candle Co., (1885) 10 App. Cas. 282; Baxter v. Ah Way, [1909] 8 C. L. R. 626.

² Cf. Liquor Control Act (Ont.), 1934, c. 26; Milk Control Act (Ont.), 1934, c. 30; Ontario Marketing Act, 1934, c. 38; Canada-France Convention Act (Dom.), 1933, c. 30; Canada-France Trade Agreement Act (Dom.), 1933, c. 31; Criminal Code (Offensive Weapons) Act (Dom.), 1933, c. 25; Pensions Act (Dom.), 1933, c. 45; Opium and Narcotic Drug Act (Dom.), 1932, c. 20; New Zealand Trade Agreement Act (Dom.), 1932, c. 34; Safety of Life at Sea and Load Line Convention Act (Dom.), 1931, c. 49.

(iv) In Acts which embody administrative features there is often a provision that regulations may be made 'for the better carrying out of the provisions' of an Act. It is submitted that the rules governing the interpretation of statutes would confine this power within very narrow limits. The language is general in order to enable minor details to be filled in which do not appear at the time when the statute is passed by parliament, and it may be regarded as a device employed to overcome the difficulties of legislating, even in matters of infinitesimal importance, at a time when parliament is not in session.²

(v) So far we have given instances of delegation which are of frequent occurrence, and we may go so far as to say that they no longer excite undue attention or objection once the principle of delegation is conceded as being necessary. We must turn now to those cases of delegation where the enabling Act contemplates that major alterations, both of policy and administration, may be made by the executive without the questions being re-submitted to parliament. This purpose may be accomplished in many ways. The simplest form is to empower the executive to repeal or amend parliamentary legislation. A favourite device

¹ [1911] 1 K. B. 410.

² Cf. Public Service Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 16; Mining Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 28; Provincial Land Tax Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 80; Amusements Tax Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 32; Northern Development Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 36; Mill Licensing Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 39; Forestry Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 41.

in England is the power to remove difficulties, which we are instructed is used only as a temporary expedient to enable some major legislative scheme to be put into effect.¹

In Canada we have a somewhat similar device. Thus the Ontario Agricultural Societies Act declares that 'the minister may decide all matters of doubt or dispute as to the working or construction of this Act, and his decision shall be final, except that an appeal therefrom may be made to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council'.² A like provision is contained in the Ontario Horticultural Societies Act.³ The dominion parliament has enacted legislation with similar clauses. Thus the Electricity Inspection Act declares that the governor in council may, among other things, establish rules and regulations which are necessary for giving effect to the provisions of the Act and for declaring its true intent and meaning in all cases of doubt.⁴

The evidence given by Sir William Graham-Harrison before the committee on ministers' powers implies that the authority delegated to the minister, or to other members of the executive, to remove difficulties is given only in cases where a major legislative scheme is being introduced. In Canada there does not seem to be a similar restriction applied to the delegation of a power almost as wide as that conferred in England. If one may be permitted to criticize, apart from full investigation, it would appear that in Canada the social conscience is prepared to accept such a delegation even in cases where on the surface there appears to be no vital necessity for such delegation.

(vi) Finally we come to that sphere of delegation where the legislature has transferred power to an administrative authority by merely declaring the policy or principle which it regards as

¹ Report on Ministers' Powers, p. 48, question 658.

² R. S. O., 1927, c. 71, s. 2.

³ R. S. O., 1927, c. 72.

⁴ R. S. C., 1927, c. 55. See also Excise Act, R. S. C., 1927, c. 60, s. 264; Gas Inspection Act, R. S. C., 1927, c. 82, s. 3 (c); Patent Medicine Act, R. S. C., 1927, c. 151, s. 21; Water Meters Inspection Act, R. S. C., 1927, c. 209, s. 3.

desirable under the circumstances, without working out in detail the methods or courses to be adopted in accomplishing its purpose. The most important problems of administrative legislation in Canada fall within this category. Thus the Ontario Minimum Wage Act declares that 'after due enquiry the Board may establish a minimum wage and the maximum number of hours per week for which such minimum wage shall be paid'.¹ The Ontario Theatres and Cinematographs Act declares that the board of censors shall have power to permit or to prohibit the exhibition of any film . . . which it is proposed to use in Ontario.² Under the Ontario Milk Control Act of 1934 the lieutenant-governor in council could make regulations 'governing and supervising the producing, processing, handling, storing, hauling, delivering, distributing, keeping or offering for sale and the sale of milk, and all persons engaged or employed therein . . . (c) governing disputes and the determination of disputes arising between producers and distributors of milk, or between any two or more classes or branches of persons engaged in the milk industry as producers, processors, handlers, haulers, distributors, or vendors of milk, or as being otherwise engaged in the said industry; (d) governing agreements which may be entered into between producers of milk and other persons or classes of persons engaged in the milk industry'.³

These are only a few instances chosen at random to illustrate an important modern trend in Canadian government. Many more could be quoted from our statutes. The inference to be drawn from such delegation of authority is that the legislature does not know what remedy to apply to the new problems that have arisen, and legislators prefer the flexibility of the 'trial and error' method found in the experimental laboratory to the rigidity of legislative enactment. Of even wider extent was the delegation of legislative authority which characterized Canadian legislation during the Great War, and is again a feature of our social life as the result of the current depression. Thus the Canadian Unemployment Relief Act of 1931 stated that 'the Governor in Council shall have full power to make all such orders and regulations as may be deemed necessary or desirable for relieving distress, providing employment and, within the competence of parliament, maintaining peace, order and good government throughout Canada'.¹ The Canadian Relief Act of 1933 declared that the governor in council may 'when Parliament is not in session . . . take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of Parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada; and at all times to take such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the Dominion or any Province thereof'.²

¹ R. S. O., 1927, c. 277, s. 11.

² R. S. O., 1927, c. 285, s. 3 (i).

³ 24 George V, c. 30 (Ont.). This section has been amended (25 George V, c. 40).

It will be seen that the statutes referred to range over a wide field. To criticize on principle the delegation of any of the major delegations of power is easy. It is possible to argue that the delegations of power are undemocratic, that they interfere with the liberty of the subject, that they form the wedge for the entrance into our social life of bureaucracy and dictatorship. But the lawyer or jurist is no longer merely a contemplative creature describing the law as it exists. The very development of the administrative system has forced him to become constructive, not only in interpreting the tendencies of social existence, but also in assisting in moulding and guiding them.

Looking at the problem from this viewpoint we realize that government, in the present era, cannot in Canada go on without the delegation of wide legislative authority to the executive.

¹ 21 George V, c. 58, s. 4. See also the Canadian Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 22 George V, c. 13, s. 3.

² 23 George V, c. 18, s. 2 (b).

Lord Donoughmore's committee recognized this clearly, as do English writers such as Mr. C. T. Carr¹ and Professor J. Willis²; and even a superficial acquaintance with the various governments in Canada brings conviction of the correctness of these views. However, the continued delegation of legislative power means the development of a vast administrative machine, and leaves us open to all the dangers of bureaucracy—the foe of democracy. What, then, is to be done? What is being done? Legal theory has learned that a political system succeeds only in so far as it is built upon the traditions of the people. We must therefore preserve whatever of democratic principles is of value to-day; and the fundamental principle inherent in the democracy of the Anglo-Saxon peoples is the control exercised by the people through representative institutions over those who wield power and authority within the state.

Let us therefore examine the methods which are employed at present to control or supervise administrative legislation. These methods are either judicial or extra-judicial. The exercise of judicial jurisdiction to test the vires of legislation enacted by subordinate legislative authorities is too well known to need discussion. The important point to note is that the Canadian courts, in spite of extra-judicial criticism, have limited themselves to testing only the vires of such legislative bodies. They have declared that it is not their duty to determine whether the legislation is wise, that that duty rests on the authority which issues the regulations; and they have rightly adopted the attitude that they cannot substitute their discretion for that of the administrator. Consequently, the judiciary confine their efforts to seeing that the administrator has acted within the scope of the authority delegated to him by the legislature. But attempts have been made to narrow even such jurisdiction as the courts do possess. Many Acts contain clauses attempting to oust the jurisdiction of the judges. The reasons given for such restrictions on review are that there is a need for certainty, so that action taken under the authority of regulations passed by the administrative body under the authority of the enabling Act will not be subject to review or to be upset at a time when many persons have acquired rights in reliance on the regulations. In some instances the private citizen can agree whole-heartedly with such legislation, which in effect places the regulations in the position of a private bill as to which there is little objection. An example of such a power is provided by the Ontario Municipal Board Act, which provides that 'every by-law of a municipality approved by the board and every debenture issued thereunder bearing the seal and certificate of the board shall for all purposes be valid and binding upon the corporation of such municipality and the ratepayers thereof and upon the property liable for any rate imposed upon or under the authority of the by-law and its validity may not be contested or questioned for any cause whatsoever'.¹

¹ Delegated Legislation (Cambridge, 1921).

² Parliamentary Powers of English Government Departments (Harvard University Press, 1934).

In this example the declaration that the courts shall not review the validity of the order or regulation is clear and unequivocal. However, two other devices are often employed which have given rise to some doubt. Some Acts contain a provision that regulations made thereunder should have the same force and effect as if contained in the statute itself.² Others

¹ 22 George V, c. 27, s. 86 (1). Subsection (2) of this section provides an interesting illustration of the extent to which legislative power is conferred upon administrative bodies. It states that 'where the board is satisfied that any by-law . . . of a municipality is not entirely beyond its jurisdiction and powers or void ab initio, and the validity thereof has not been questioned in any court in any litigation which is pending . . . the board may, notwithstanding any invalidity in the by-law . . . approve the same, and in such case the provisions of subs. (1) shall apply to the by-law and to every debenture issued thereunder bearing the seal and the certificate of the board.'

² Cf. Liquor Control Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 257, s. 10 (1); Post Office Act R. S. C., 1927, c. 161, s. 7 (2): 'Every such regulation shall have force and effect as if it formed part of the provisions of this Act.' Live Stock Pedigree provide that the regulations should be placed before the proper legislature.¹ Indeed, there are cases in which both devices appear in the same statute. Recent English decisions² interpreting these devices have not served to clarify their effect, while in Canada we have worked out no clear judicial interpretation of them.

We now turn to consider the nature and effect of extra-judicial controls. The most important one, of course, is that of placing the regulations before the legislature. The effectiveness of this method of control was discussed at length by Lord Donoughmore's committee, and the conclusion which may be gathered from the evidence and from the report is that the procedure is unsatisfactory. The report suggests that new standing committees be created in each house of parliament to scrutinize the regulations for the purpose of drawing the attention of members to anything out of the ordinary course. Whether the suggested procedure will prove satisfactory is a matter of conjecture, but at any rate it may serve to revive or at least stimulate parliamentary control. The need for some machinery of this nature is even greater in Canada than it is in Great Britain. Throughout the legislatures in Canada there is no machinery whatever for scrutinizing regulations, not even the counterpart of the standing committees which exist in Great Britain at the present time, and we may safely say that during the past few years no question has arisen in any of the Canadian legislatures as to the validity or wisdom of any regulation.

Act, R. S. C., 1927, c. 121; Militia Act, R. S. C., 1927, c. 132, s. 140: 'Such regulations shall . . . have the same force in law as if they formed part of this Act.'

¹ Canadian examples of such provisions are contained in Department of Education Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 322, s. 12; Woodmen's Employment Investigation Act, 24 George V, c. 66, s. 7 (2) (Ont.); Irrigation Act, R. S. C., 1927, c. 104, s. 64; Patent Medicine Act, R. S. C., 1927, c. 151, s. 22; Guarantee Companies Securities Act, R. S. O., 1927, c. 230, s. 7.

² e.g. Rex v. Minister of Health: ex parte Yaffe, [1930] 2 K. B. 98; [1931] A. C. 494. Cf. Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, [1894] A. C. 347; Rex v. Inspector of Cannon Row Police Station: ex parte Brady, (1921) 37 T. L. R. 856; Booth v. The King, (1915) 51 S. C. R. 20.

Apart from the possibility of parliamentary scrutiny, there is a growing tendency in Canada to set up advisory committees of various sorts to consult with the government in relation to the issue of any suggested regulations. For example, the Ontario Apprenticeship Act provides that 'no change in the Act or regulations affecting any designated trade shall be made without serving written notice upon representative organizations of employers or employees in such trade, or, where no such organizations exist, upon at least ten representative individuals in various parts of the Province, at least one month before the proposed change is to go into effect, and providing opportunity for representatives of such employers and employees to meet the Board for a full discussion of the proposed changes'.¹ It is submitted that the creation in Canada of such advisory committees of representative persons interested in the legislation is the most progressive advance so far made in Canada in developing new institutions to supplement the work of the legislatures. Such institutions are essentially an extension of the democratic principle. It is almost impossible for a member of parliament to speak for all the social interests which have arisen within his constituency, even were he allowed to do so by his party affiliations and discipline; and the emergence of these representative organizations and advisory committees, which come into direct and continual contact with the executive, will probably mean that any real or imaginary hardships flowing from the exercise of the power delegated to the executive will be discovered at an early stage. Of course, the hardships may not necessarily be avoided by these committees, but their existence at least will be brought to the attention of the public, and the members of parliament will then be in a position to demand that injustice or harshness in the operation of legislation be eliminated. In concluding this part of the discussion then, it may be said that the development of delegation of legislative power ought to lead to a greater measure of popular control if persons interested in democratic institutions will endeavour to create the new machinery made necessary by the recognition of the social needs of the day.

¹ 22 George V, c. 44, s. 17 (a). See also Milk Control Act (Ont.), supra; Ontario Industrial Standards Act (1935, c. 28; 1936, c. 29).

The social problems which have served to disrupt the normal functioning of our legislatures have also served to impose a greater burden upon our courts. However, whereas frequent elections have had the effect of permeating our legislatures with new ideas, we must remember that the courts are composed of men who are among the greatest experts in their field, and who are therefore endowed with all the virtues and subject to all the handicaps which surround the expert. Before reaching the bench the judges have learned a certain technique with peculiarities all its own: a legal technique which worked admirably in the field for which it was created—that is to say, in settling disputes between parties, in giving effect to the rights of individuals. Life progressed at a leisurely rate, and it was possible for the judges to adapt the substantive and adjectival law to new conditions. But even so we find special tribunals growing up from time to time to administer new doctrines based, for example, on equity, good conscience, and the need of the state, such as the court of chancery and the star chamber. In time, the principles elaborated by these tribunals were absorbed into the common law, giving the common law a new orientation in dealing with the needs of the time. The end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries, however, witnessed social and economic developments which were entirely foreign to the legal approach of the preceding centuries. No longer is social justice served when the judges sit as arbiters in disputes which have already occurred, or in composing differences between a person who has already suffered an injury and the one who had inflicted the injury. The need of the present age is to determine what social needs should be satisfied before a wrong is inflicted, before any one has suffered hurt. In dealing with these problems we must recognize the individualization of rules, not the 'rugged' generalized individualism of 'the reasonable man'. The community cannot afford to wait until a tenant is injured in health in order to punish the owner of the premises for maintaining unsanitary conditions. Society really gains nothing by imprisoning a reckless and irresponsible motor-car driver after he has injured and probably maimed a pedestrian. The capacity for injury must, if possible, be anticipated and controlled.¹ New standards must be developed in all fields of human endeavour which will be in harmony with the new social philosophy of the age. Care of the sick, the poor, the aged, and the infirm, elimination of slums, control of industry in the interests of humanity, protection of children, universal education, development of natural resources for the benefit of mankind, all demand immediate attention. The views of social scientists as to the functions of the state have been revolutionized; but the legal technique and machinery necessary to cope with these new demands have been unable to keep pace with these theories. What the demands are we know; how they are to be met we have not worked out. Furthermore, our courts, even if they were presented with a clear scheme of the juristic aims of the new society, are not an experimental laboratory. They are fundamentally unsuited at present for the creation of new standards out of 'whole cloth', bound as they are by the principle of stare decisis and moving, as Professor J. Willis has said, in 'the fog of common law'. At any rate, the legislatures have entrusted these experiments to new administrative bodies. If we attempt to criticize these bodies we must remember that they are largely of an experimental nature and that little indication has been given by parliament as to the course to be pursued.

¹ Under the Ontario Highway Traffic Act (R. S. O., 1927, c. 251) provision is made to test the capacity of all motor-car drivers before a driver's licence is issued. At present we have under discussion more adequate tests in this connexion.

Thus the Ontario workmen's compensation board is directed to decide every case 'upon the real merits and justice of the case'.¹ The Ontario minimum wage board is empowered to establish, after due inquiry, 'a minimum wage and the maximum hours per week for which such minimum wage shall be paid'.² The Ontario board of motion-picture censors is given power 'to permit or to prohibit the exhibition of any film or slide which it is proposed to use in Ontario'.³ The Ontario athletic commission is directed to see whether every contract for the management of a professional athlete is 'fair and reasonable'.⁴ The Ontario liquor control board may determine whether a person is a fit and proper person to hold a permit for purchasing liquor.⁵ The Canadian postmaster-general is given authority to determine what may and what may not be mailable matter.⁶ The Canadian board of railway commissioners may fix, determine, and enforce 'just and reasonable rates'.⁷

It will be seen that in all these examples the power to be exercised by the administrative board or tribunal is stated in the widest terms, and little or no guidance has been given to it as to the manner in which the power so conferred is to be exercised. The delegation of powers of this nature is never dangerous in itself, and is probably always justified by the circumstances. The danger, if any, lies in the manner in which these powers are administered. It would be unfair to a group of men who are appointed to administer an Act to hamper them by the imposition of restrictions when the purpose of the legislation is to enable the board or tribunal to discover a solution to certain problems as they arise. Indeed, the debates on the legislation under discussion seem to show that the legislatures have recognized that the subject-matters governed by the statutes are such that administrative discretion will best serve

¹ R. S. O., 1927, c. 179, s. 67 (4).

³ Ibid., c. 285.

⁴ Ibid., c. 261.

⁶ R. S. C., 1927, c. 161.

² Ibid., c. 277.

⁵ Ibid., c. 257.

⁷ Ibid., c. 170.

the ends of society. It is essential, however, that the legislatures realize fully the possible dangers inherent in any such transfer of jurisdiction to administrative authorities, and that discretion should only be conferred on them where the ordinary judicial procedure appears socially inadequate; and then, accompanied by careful safeguards, to ensure that 'justice' will be done.

What, then, are the circumstances which will justify the creation of new tribunals rather than the passing of legislation to be administered by the courts? Briefly, a desire for expedition, low cost, accessibility, freedom from technicality are the usual advantages which favour the development of new administrative tribunals. To these must be added, as we have already pointed out, the paramount factor of the development of new standards chiefly in the social services. The extent to which any of the factors mentioned will affect the decision of a legislature in framing new legislation will depend on the circumstances of each individual case, and it is a practical impossibility to lay down in advance any general principles. In this respect the only safeguard against undue delegation of the power of adjudication lies in the intelligent realization of the new legal philosophy of government and the principles of social jurisprudence. If the legislator is conscious of what the rise of these numerous tribunals means, the inevitable result must be a greater vigilance in scrutinizing not only the enabling legislation when it is first introduced, but also the activities of the tribunal as disclosed in the annual reports placed before the legislature. To assist the member of parliament it is essential that the law schools of the universities intensify their research into the field of administrative law, so as to provide the material upon which criticism, both adverse and constructive, may be based.

After the legislature has approved the delegation of any specific power to an administrative tribunal its control over the powers delegated is supplemented by that of the courts. We must now proceed to examine the nature of judicial review of administrative adjudication. In the first place, the courts will see whether the administrator has confined himself within the boundaries set by the legislature—that is to say, the most important element in judicial control of administrative action is the doctrine of ultra vires. But even if the administrator has acted within his jurisdiction, the court will inquire whether, in the course of the proceedings, the principles of ‘natural justice’ have been observed.¹ The doctrine that inferior tribunals must conform to the principles of ‘natural justice’ seems to be a piece of judicial law-making, but an examination of the judicial application of these principles shows that they form the very basis of what the average citizen regards as essentially just and fair in any adjudication. These principles have nowhere been clearly defined, but it would appear that they include the following: that no person should be judge in his own cause, and that every person must be given an adequate opportunity of presenting his case and rebutting any evidence which is detrimental to him. It must be admitted that aside from these principles there are other attributes and forms of procedure in a court of law which, to the layman, are connected with and form part of the process of administering justice. Thus, for instance, there are the technical rules of evidence, the representation of parties by counsel, the hearing in open court. However, these matters are not of the essence of justice. Many of the technical rules of evidence might be eliminated; and, in fact, writers like Dean Wigmore suggest that the rules could be substantially altered, not only without injuring the administration of justice, but even furthering its aims materially. Hearings in open court have been eliminated in some instances, as in the juvenile courts, without causing injustice, and representation by counsel, especially in administrative matters where the factors to be considered are often of an economic or social nature, is of doubtful benefit.¹ The other principles, such as that no man should be judge in his own cause and that every person should have an opportunity to present his case, cannot be eliminated without doing violence to the essentials of justice, without making 'justice' meaningless.

¹ Cf. Local Government Board v. Arlidge, [1915] A. C. 120, especially Lord Haldane; Board of Education v. Rice, [1911] A. C. 179. Cf. W. I. Jennings, ‘Natural Justice’ in 14 Public Administration (1936), pp. 332 ff.

However, in spite of the efforts of the courts to exercise some measure of control over the administrator with respect to the matters just mentioned, the legislatures have in certain cases deliberately deprived the courts of jurisdiction. Thus, the Ontario workmen's compensation board,² the Canadian post-master-general,³ the board of inquiry under the Canadian Immigration Act,⁴ the Ontario milk control board,⁵ the Ontario board of motion-picture censors⁶ are called upon to act as prosecutor, judge, and jury. There are also a number of examples which violate this principle to an even greater extent. Thus, under the Ontario Embalmers and Funeral Directors Act,⁷ and under the Ontario Optometry Act,⁸ the very persons who may determine whether a person has been guilty of unethical practices are fellow members of the profession of the 'accused'. It may be that there are practical difficulties in the way of any other procedure, but the fact remains that there is something repugnant to the human mind when a man may be deprived of his livelihood by his competitors sitting in judgement upon him.

The restrictions thus imposed upon the courts were recognized by Masten J.A. of the Ontario court of appeal in Re Ashby et al.,⁹ when he said 'the fact that all the members of the Board are optometrists, engaged in the same profession as the appellants, ¹ At a round-table discussion on the status of aliens held in connexion with the Annual Meeting of the Canadian Political Science Association, May 1934, the consensus of opinion seemed to be that counsel rarely served a useful purpose at immigration inquiries.

² R. S. O., 1927, c. 179.

⁴ Ibid., c. 93.

⁶ R. S. O., 1927, c. 285.

⁸ R. S. O., 1927, c. 215.

³ R. S. C., 1927, c. 161.

⁵ 24 George V, c. 30.

⁷ 18 George V, c. 31.

⁹ [1934] O. W. N. 338.

is fully answered by the fact that these men were appointed by order in council passed in pursuance of the statute. If the court were of the opinion that such appointments were objectionable, it would still have no jurisdiction to question the appointment.'

When we come to the question of giving a party an adequate opportunity of presenting his case the courts have not developed their jurisdiction as might have been expected. The leading cases of Local Government Board v. Arlidge,¹ De Vertieul v. Knaggs,² and *Wilson v. Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Co.*³ provide evidence of the doubts and hesitations of the courts in this respect. But even where the courts are prepared to exercise jurisdiction they are often prevented from doing so by the declaration of the legislature. For example, the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Act declares as follows: 'The Board shall have exclusive jurisdiction to examine into, hear and determine all matters and questions arising under this Part [dealing with the granting of compensation] and as to any matter or thing in respect to any power, authority or discretion conferred upon the Board, and the action or decision of the Board thereon shall be final and conclusive and shall not be open to question or review in any court and no proceedings by or before the Board shall be restrained by injunction, prohibition or other process or proceeding in any court or be removable by certiorari or otherwise into any court.'⁴ The Ontario Securities Act states that the order of the proper officer cancelling any registration of a stockbroker for misconduct shall not be 'subject to review in any way in any court'.⁵ Section 23 of the Canadian Immigration Act provides that 'no court, and no judge or officer thereof, shall have jurisdiction to review, quash, reverse, restrain or otherwise interfere with any proceeding, decision or order of the Minister or of any Board of Inquiry, or officer in charge had, made or given under the authority and in accordance with the

¹ [1915] A. C. 120.

² [1918] A. C. 557.

³ [1922] 1 A. C. 202.

⁴ R. S. O., 1927, c. 179, s. 67 (1).

⁵ 20 George V, c. 39.

provisions of this Act relating to the detention or deportation of any rejected immigrant, passenger or other person, upon any ground whatsoever, unless such person is a Canadian citizen or has Canadian domicile'.¹

In spite of these provisions the courts will attempt to exercise jurisdiction if they are able to find any ground which will justify them in doing so. Thus, in spite of the strong language of the Canadian Immigration Act,² and the even stronger language of the Canadian Chinese Immigration Act,³ the Canadian courts have declared that they possess jurisdiction to review the findings of the immigration authorities to see whether they have acted within the scope of their authority and whether the principles of 'natural justice' have been observed.⁴ However, this is as far as the courts will go. If they cannot reverse the decision of the administrative officer on the ground that his act is ultra vires or that he has failed to observe the principles of 'natural justice', his decision will stand even if the court is of the opinion that the decision is unwise or harsh. The courts have rightly adopted the attitude that the wisdom of the decision is for the tribunal and that they cannot substitute their discretion for that of the tribunal vested with authority by parliament.

This situation has been used in Canada by the critics of the system of administrative law as the basis of their argument that the system of administrative adjudication is in essence bureaucratic, with all the implications which that term conveys to the Anglo-Saxon. To eliminate the possibility of abuse it has been suggested that a system of administrative courts should be established, notably by Mr. W. A. Robson of the London School of Economics.⁵ However, it is submitted that, if there is a real danger of bureaucracy, a system of administrative courts composed of persons imbued with the ideals of the civil service would strengthen the dangers. It may be that in time a special division of the courts of justice in Canada will have to be designated to deal with these matters on review; but such a division can function only when the administrators have succeeded in developing the standards which the legislature expects them to discover. Until such time, it is submitted, judicial review may prove a handicap rather than a benefit; but the day when such a system of review may be introduced should be hastened by inducing the administrative bodies that have been created to develop their standards consciously, and by requiring the publication of reasons for their decisions in some form or other. It is only by such means that the administrator will be compelled to take thought and to offer reasoned decisions containing the principles upon which he acts.

¹ R. S. C., 1927, c. 93. Cf. Ex parte Venicoff, [1920] 3 K. B. 72. ² Supra.

³ R. S. C., 1927, c. 95. ⁴ See Re Low Hong Hing, [1926] 3 D. L. R. 692.

⁵ See his Justice and Administrative Law (London, 1928), his article in 3 Political Quarterly, at pp. 346 ff., and his evidence before Lord Donoughmore's committee on ministers' powers. Professor C. K. Allen disagrees with Professor Robson, preferring the 'trained judicial faculty' to 'a particular kind of specialized virtuosity' (Bureaucracy Triumphant, p. 67 (Oxford, 1931)).

Reference has been made to two important objections against administrative adjudication. The creating statutes frequently leave the question of procedure and the publication of decisions to the discretion of the board or tribunal. It frequently happens that critics of administrative law have not taken the trouble to make an actual examination of how the boards actually act in relation to these two matters. In this connexion I may point out that a great many of the boards and commissions in Canada before making any decision bring the parties face to face and allow them to be represented by counsel, a notable example being the workmen's compensation board of Ontario, which has such absolute powers. In addition, many boards, such as the Canada railway board and the Ontario municipal board, publish their decisions, and the decisions of a number of other boards are available for the asking. Thus, then, when any criticism is levelled at administrative procedure in Canada from these two points of view, it is emphatically necessary that it be examined in relation to each particular board, otherwise it is vitiated by theory or discounted by doctrinaire and sentimental ignorance.

The growth of administrative agencies, whose activities touch the life of the citizen at so many points, has brought into sharper relief the immunities enjoyed by the crown. Indeed, the 'garland of the prerogative' has become 'a crown of thorns', in that many of these agencies enjoy complete protection from procedure in relation to their contracts and torts. Canadians suffer under similar disadvantages to those existing in England and very few examples could be given from Canadian law where immunities have been modified. In this respect Canada differs from Scotland, Australia, and South Africa. It is interesting to note that in 1936 the Canadian Bar Association forwarded a draft bill to the federal minister of justice and the provincial attorneys-general in the hope that it would, in some form or other, eventually become law. Such action has been long overdue; and if legislation is enacted it will do something to modernize the law of the administration.¹

In conclusion I may say, with Professor Frankfurter, that 'ultimate protection is to be found in ourselves, our zeal for liberty, our respect for one another and for the common good—a truth so obviously accepted that its demands in practice are largely overlooked'.² In addition, the complexities of modern life, especially in such a state as Canada, rule out to a large degree the comparatively simple procedure of the ordinary courts. We must not brush aside administrative tribunals and law by an uncritical devotion to the past. Because common law and equity have generously served society in the past, we must not erect them into social finalities. The real question is, not whether administrative tribunals and law are divorced from our legal traditions and do not fit into them, but whether they provide substantial justice for the individuals and groups within any administrative jurisdiction concerned. As Lord Macmillan has recently suggested, we must not sacrifice social benefits because the methods of their realization do not move along the lines of our traditional legal systems or hallowed juristic principles.¹

¹ See Proceedings of the Canadian Bar Association, vol. xxi; 14 Canadian Bar Review (1936), at pp. 606 ff. (where examples and the bill are given); W. P. M. Kennedy, 2 University of Toronto Law Journal, at pp. 137 ff.; W. P. M. Kennedy, 'Suits by and against the Crown' in 6 Canadian Bar Review (1928), at pp. 329 ff.

² The Public and its Government, p. 159 (New Haven, 1930).

¹ Two Ways of Thinking, The Rede Lecture, 1934 (Cambridge, 1934).

CHAPTER XXVII

ASPECTS OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND CUSTOM

WHEN the first part of this treatise closed in 1922 definite advances had been made in the ambit and scope of Canadian autonomy—domestic, inter-imperial, and international. The first was practically complete, the second had reached a stage of the fullest consultation, the third disclosed developments through which Canada possessed a distinct international status. In the period now to be surveyed the great central points are the imperial conferences of 1926, 1929,¹ 1930, and the Statute of Westminster, 1931. These bear witness to clarification in further understandings and conventions and in legal definitions. Before dealing, however, with the Statute of Westminster, which requires separate treatment both for itself and on account of the peculiar Canadian forces at work, it is necessary to refer to some subjects of importance. It would of course be impossible to go into every detail of law and custom which has emerged during these years. In this chapter we shall confine our survey to the following matters: (i) nationality, (ii) legislative powers, (iii) executive powers, (iv) diplomacy, (v) treaty-making.

i. Nationality

We have already pointed out that in 1921 Canada defined Canadian ‘nationals’² under the recognition in the covenant of the league of nations that each member has ‘nationals’ of its own. Unfortunately, the Canadian Nationals Act³ clashes with the Canadian Immigration Act¹ and creates a somewhat anomalous situation. The Immigration Act defines 'Canadian citizens' and 'Canadian domicile'—their solitary definitions in Canadian law. These definitions might serve for pure purposes of immigration, but unfortunately they are taken over into the Canadian Nationals Act; and there is something lacking in national dignity when a foreigner, in seeking a definition of a Canadian 'national', is compelled to refer to an Act dealing solely with immigration. The situation is not, however, so simple. When the two Acts are read together there emerges the fact that there are two classes of persons under the description 'Canadian'—a person may be a Canadian 'national', but not a Canadian 'citizen', for the simple reason that the Canadian Nationals Act, while including 'Canadian citizens' of the Immigration Act, includes as 'nationals' classes of persons who are not 'citizens' within the meaning and definition of the Canadian Immigration Act. For example, the wife of a 'Canadian citizen' (as defined in the Immigration Act), and any person born out of Canada whose father was a 'Canadian national' at the time of that person's birth, are Canadian 'nationals', whereas such wife and such child are not 'Canadian citizens' unless 'landed in' Canada under the terms and regulations of the Canadian Immigration Act. As a consequence, we have grave administrative difficulties, if not indeed injustices, the details of which must be read elsewhere.² A bill has been introduced to iron them out;³ but it appears to have been buried under the weight of administrative laissez-faire and indifference, or perhaps, we may charitably suggest, it has been postponed in the light of urgent economic and financial problems. However, a situation continues to exist which is a distinct slur on municipal and international prestige.

¹ The important parts of the reports of the conferences of 1926 and 1929 are in W. P. M. Kennedy, Statutes, Treaties, and Documents of the Canadian Constitution, at pp. 702 ff., 713 ff. (Oxford, 1930).

² Supra, p. 373, note 1.

³ R. S. C., 1927, c. 21. See Kennedy, op. cit., at pp. 700 ff.

In relation to the nationality of married women there has been an advance long overdue. Exceptional difficulties arose for Canada out of the law of the United States,¹ under which a Canadian woman marrying a citizen of the United States, ceased, ipso facto, to be a Canadian and did not become an American—she was stateless and subject to great disabilities. Such marriages were numerous. The matter was very carefully discussed and various proposals were made, but action was postponed. At length an agreement was reached at the international conference at The Hague in 1930 on an important aspect of this problem. To this agreement Canada was a party; and it was accepted by the imperial conference of 1930,² with the understanding that all members of the British Commonwealth would introduce such legislation as would give effect to the agreement of The Hague conference in the following terms:

¹ R. S. O., 1927, c. 93. See Kennedy, op. cit., at pp. 699 ff.

² See W. P. M. Kennedy, The Law of Nationality in Canada (Ottawa, 1930).

³ See W. P. M. Kennedy, 'Nationality' in 1 University of Toronto Law Journal, at pp. 139 ff., where the bill is given in extenso.

Article 8. If the national law of the wife causes her to lose her nationality on marriage with a foreigner, this consequence shall be conditional on her acquiring the nationality of her husband.

Article 9. If the national law of the wife causes her to lose her nationality upon a change in the nationality of her husband occurring during marriage, this consequence shall be conditional on her acquiring her husband's new nationality.

Article 10. Naturalization of the husband during marriage shall not involve a change in the nationality of the wife except with her consent.

Effect was given to these articles by Canadian legislation³ which came into force in 1932. The United Kingdom followed suit, but only in December 1933,⁴ after attention had been drawn to the situation at the British commonwealth relations conference held at Toronto in September 1933.⁵ The situation is as yet not entirely clear. At any rate, a Canadian woman

¹ The Cable Act of 1922 (42 Stat. L. 1021).

² Cmd. 3717, p. 22.

³ 21 & 22 George V, c. 39.

⁴ 23 & 24 George V, c. 49.

⁵ A. J. Toynbee (Ed.), British Commonwealth Relations: Proceedings of the first unofficial Conference at Toronto, p. 204 (Oxford, 1934).

marrying a citizen of the United States no longer loses her status as a British subject and Canadian citizen by reason of her marriage, and she is not stateless. In addition, her status is preserved in the United Kingdom and its dependencies by the legislation of the United Kingdom. What is her status in other dominions? Is her allegiance something of a local nature? It is desirable that the law relating to married women be uniform throughout the empire.

Canada has not been sympathetic to the claim that marriage should have no effect on nationality, and that a woman should be left entirely free to make her own choice. This position was examined with great care by the Canadian authorities before The Hague conference of 1930 and was not accepted. It would seem reasonable that, where a Canadian woman has married an alien, acquiring his nationality, and establishing herself outside Canadian jurisdiction, she should not expect to retain of her own will her status as a Canadian national. Such a position would be hard to defend, and it would further complicate situations arising out of the present nationality laws of most states.

There is, however, one problem which Canada has refused to meet in spite of strong opinions advanced for its solution. We have frequent situations where a Canadian—perhaps born and bred in Canada, of a family Canadian for many generations—marries an alien in Canada, acquires her husband's nationality, and thus loses her status as a subject under Canadian law. It happens that such a woman is often deserted in Canada, or her husband leaves Canada and never returns. The wife, now an alien, may become liable to deportation under immigration regulations. It ought to be possible to meet such a situation by some provision in Canadian law that she should retain her status as a subject while she continues to reside in Canada. The problems of married women are shot through with difficulties which cannot be solved without uniform international action; and The Hague conference of 1930 disclosed that the road ahead is overwhelmingly heavy with opposition. On the other hand, Canada, as an immigration country, might well do something to meet the inequitable situation to which attention has been drawn.

ii. Legislative powers

At the end of almost three-quarters of a century it may be convenient to review in some broad detail the processes of interpreting the sections of the British North America Act, 1867, dealing with the distribution of legislative powers.¹ We have already seen something of the purposes which lay behind the Quebec resolutions of 1864 and the Westminster resolutions of 1866—purposes which were intended to be translated into the British North America Act. We must, however, recall that, when a unitary constitution was out of the question, John A. Macdonald bent his energies, with the apparent support of his colleagues, to give to the new federation as strong a bias towards a unitary scheme as possible. Certain forces have worked in the opposite direction, and of these the most important issues from the fact that the judicial committee of the privy council, for all practical purposes, have interpreted the British North America Act strictly as a statute, and have refused, as happened for many years in the high court of Australia in analogous circumstances,² to allow the importation into the Act of anything not necessarily implicit, to follow American (or even Australian) precedents, to see in it anything of a contractual nature or of a treaty, or to be guided by its historical origins. They have indeed—and most unfortunately—paid a certain amount of lip-service to the last two of these points of view; but as a statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom they have applied to it strict rules of statutory construction, which, whatever else they may have done, have divorced it from history and from the intention of those who in truth framed it, with the result that the centrifugal forces in Canadian national life have been strengthened.

¹ For an admirable discussion of this matter see V. C. MacDonald, 'Judicial Interpretation of the Canadian Constitution' in 1 University of Toronto Law Journal, at pp. 260 ff.

² See W. P. M. Kennedy, Essays in Constitutional Law, at pp. 103 ff. (Oxford, 1934).

When the Act began to function Macdonald fondly hoped that 'all conflict of jurisdiction and authority' would be avoided,¹ so clearly did he believe that the distribution of legislative powers had been given statutory statement. Every text-book is careful to explain that, apparently drawing lessons from the origins of the American civil war, important deviations from the American scheme were necessary; and contemporary discussions and evidence make it clear that in Canada the general residuum of powers granted to the federal legislature was intended to include all subject-matters of national importance. Macdonald spoke of the Canadian plan as one in which the federal legislature would control 'the general mass of sovereign legislation'. 'We have', he said, 'strengthened the central government. We have given the general legislature all the great subject of legislation. We have conferred on them, not only specifically and in detail all the powers which are incident to sovereignty, but we have expressly declared that all subjects of general interest not distinctly and exclusively conferred upon the local governments and the local legislatures shall be conferred upon the general government and legislature.'² This exposition was not left to the colonists alone, and care was taken that the basic idea of the colonial plan should be made clear to the legislature of the United Kingdom. Lord Carnarvon, the colonial secretary, said: 'The real object which we have in view is to give to the central government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured in those questions that are of common import to all the provinces; and at the same time to retain for each province so ample a measure of municipal liberty and self-government as will allow and indeed compel them to exercise those local powers which they can exercise with great advantage to the community. . . . In closing my observations upon the distribution of powers, I ought to point out that, just as the authority of the central government will prevail whenever it may come into conflict with the local legislatures, so the residue of legislation, if any, unprovided for in the specific classification which I have explained, will belong to the central body. It will be seen, under the ninety-first clause, that the classification is not intended to 'restrict the generality' of the powers previously given to the central parliament, and that those powers extend to all laws made "for the peace, order and good government" of the confederation—terms, which, according to all precedent, carry with them an ample measure of legislative authority.¹

¹ See W. P. M. Kennedy, Statutes, Treaties, &c., p. 559.

² Kennedy, op. cit., p. 558.

Macdonald and Carnarvon could scarcely have been clearer. It was made evident both in the colonial and British legislatures that the scheme of the distribution of legislative powers should not lack a setting of the originating ideas: affairs common to all the provinces, whatever their locus, if of national importance, were to lie within the legislative authority of the federal parliament, while provincial subject-matters were to be such as were of a purely local nature. After such deliberate care we can well understand Macdonald's optimism. He and Carnarvon both believed that the governing principles were made abundantly plain in the Act, and that, as Macdonald said, the federal powers were so apparent that in any contest over jurisdiction the federation 'must win'.²

As soon as the Act began to call for judicial interpretation, it would seem that, at first, the judicial committee grasped and accepted these governing principles. Thus, in 1882, it upheld a federal temperance Act, prohibiting except under restrictive limitations, the liquor traffic throughout Canada.¹ This judgement seemed to support the view that, if a federal Act were necessary for 'the peace, order, and good government' of Canada, it was intra vires the federal legislature, even though it might incidentally and seriously affect 'property and civil rights' exclusively granted to the provinces. This position did not long survive before a series of decisions,² which reached the clearest expression of interpretation in 1925. In that year Lord Haldane laid it down that their lordships did not think it 'now open to them to treat Russell v. The Queen as having established the general principle that the mere fact that Dominion legislation is for the general advantage of Canada or is such that it will meet a mere want which is felt throughout the Dominion, renders it competent, if it cannot be brought within the heads enumerated specifically in section 91'.³ It would appear, then, that Macdonald's 'subjects of general interest', Carnarvon's 'questions that are of common import' are ruled out, in their generality, of the federation's powers. In face apparently of such a possibility, the judicial committee seemed to believe that they must put some meaning on the power over 'peace, order, and good government'—that is on 'general interest' or 'common import'; and they decided, emphasizing a previous judgement in In re Board of Commerce Act, that these words confined the general residuary power to cases arising out of some extraordinary national peril. It would seem then that, under Lord Haldane's interpretation, the federal legislative powers are normally those enumerated in section 91, and that the dominion can only invade the provincial powers in the valid exercise of its enumerated powers, except in cases of 'peril', 'calamity', 'pestilence', or 'famine'—'common import' and 'common interest' would appear not to exist in normal circumstances. Indeed, it is almost fair to say that, under this process of interpretation, the residuum of powers would appear to have passed largely to the provinces under their exclusive authority over 'property and civil rights'. All this is a strange departure from those far-off days of hope when Macdonald fought the battle over the distribution of legislative powers in the dim light of the legislative chamber at Quebec, and Carnarvon expounded the scheme in the house of lords.

¹ See Sir Arthur Hardinge, The Fourth Earl of Carnarvon, p. 305, vol. i (Oxford, 1925, 3 vols.).

² Macdonald's Correspondence, p. 74 (ed. Pope, Oxford, 1921).

¹ Russell v. The Queen, [1882] 7 A. C. 829.

² Cf. Hodge v. The Queen, 9 App. Cas. 117; Attorney-General for the Dominion v. Attorney-General for Alberta, [1916] 1 A. C. 588; In re Board of Commerce Act, 1919, [1922] 1 A. C. 191.

³ Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, [1925] A. C. 396.

Recent years have brought few definite changes. It is true that the dominion parliament, legislating under its power over 'marriage and divorce', has filled a distinct social gap by legislation granting divorce jurisdiction to the Ontario courts,¹ and has also provided that no Canadian marriage is invalid because the man is a brother of a deceased husband of the woman or is a son of such brother, and that a wife has the right to divorce on the mere ground of adultery;² but in interpretation vast problems remain. Many have professed to see in more recent decisions of the judicial committee a swing towards strengthening federal powers. When, however, the judgement upholding federal control over combines is carefully examined, it would seem that it merely recognizes a legitimate application of the federal power over criminal law. Perhaps, however, the most important point in this judgement is a concluding dictum by Lord Atkin.³ The dominion legislature is given among its enumerated powers control over 'the regulation of trade and commerce', and this is to prevail 'notwithstanding anything in the act'. This authority has been whittled down to very narrow limits by the judicial committee; and indeed Lord Haldane has seemed to imply that the power was not in itself of any value to the federal legislature apart from some other power granted to the dominion.¹ In other words, a power, as substantial as any other federal enumerated power and one protected in its authority, 'notwithstanding anything in the act', has been relegated to the curious position of mere ancillary authority. Lord Atkin went out of his way to say that 'the words of the statute must receive their proper construction where they stand as giving an independent authority to parliament over the particular subject-matter'. What the scope of that authority may be must await judicial interpretation, but the dictum is full of possibilities; and we shall watch with interest to see if it will provide an interpretation agreeable to the general principles laid down by Macdonald and Carnarvon—'general interest' and 'common import'. Not much sign of change can be drawn from the decisions establishing federal control over broadcasting² and aviation.³ Both subject-matters are modern; but it is fair to assume, on anything like a generic principle of interpretation, that they would have come under federal control in 1867 had the subject-matters been known at that time. Perhaps, indeed, the only importance of these two cases lies, for our purposes, in that they may disclose, as a distinguished jurist has suggested, a new method of 'twisting' the Act, which 'may be fraught with more error than the literalistic doctrines of Haldane'.⁴

¹ Cf. supra, pp. 395-6; 20 & 21 George V, c. 14 (1930).

² R. S. C., 1927, c. 127.

³ P.A.T.A. v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1931] 2 D. L. R. 1, at pp. 11-12.

From one angle there is a distinct new approach. The judicial committee in 1930, in a judgement⁵ which has not escaped some acute legal criticism,⁶ decided that the phrase 'qualified persons' in the British North America Act included women for purposes of appointment to the senate. The vast importance of the judge-

¹ Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, [1936] A. C. 396, per Lord Haldane at p. 409.

² In re Regulation of Radio Communication, [1932] A. C. 304.

³ Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1932] A. C. 54.

⁴ Cf. V. C. MacDonald in 11 Canadian Bar Review (1933), at pp. 581 ff., 664 ff.

⁵ Edwards et al. v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A. C. 124. Cf. supra, p. 384, note 1.

⁶ G. F. Henderson, 'Eligibility of Women for the Senate' in 7 Canadian Bar Review (1929), at pp. 617 ff.

ment lies in the enunciation of a completely new principle of interpretation. Lord Sankey held that it was not necessary to apply to Canada decisions and reasonings which had commended themselves to those who had to apply the law in different centuries to countries in different stages of development, that the British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits, and that the provisions of the Act should not be cut down by a narrow and technical construction, but should be given a large and liberal interpretation. Having gone so far his lordship proceeded to point out that this new doctrine had no application to the sections governing the distribution of legislative power. I ventured to criticize the dangers, if not the absurdity, of this confusion.¹ Whatever the worth of the criticism, it is interesting to note that, in 1935, Lord Sankey went the whole distance and relied on his method of interpreting the Act as laid down in 1930, without any qualifications.²

Perhaps we should not quarrel with the advance provided; but we have no assurances that it will uniformly prevail. Indeed, there is something dangerous in having at one time the strict rules of statutory interpretation applied and at another those connected with the interpretation of a constitution. This lack of certainty may be welcome to practising lawyers, but it certainly does not appeal to the litigant. In addition, it may create a deplorable situation in accentuating the idea that we should rely on the judicial committee to exercise constituent functions. Constituent powers will receive treatment elsewhere, but it is well to point out that, whatever the judicial committee may do in this connexion, it is idle to hope for wide changes. As Dr. O. D. Skelton has well said: 'Courts may modify, they cannot replace. They can revise earlier interpretations, as new arguments, new points of view are presented, they can shift the dividing line in marginal cases, but there are barriers they cannot pass, definite assignments of power they cannot reallocate. They can give a broadening construction of existing powers, but they cannot assign to one authority powers explicitly granted to another, or modify the provisions of the B. N. A. Acts regarding the organization of the executive and legislative branches of the Dominion.¹

¹ 8 Canadian Bar Review (1930), at p. 706.

² British Coal Corporation v. The King, (1935) 51 T. L. R. 508.

Finally, in connexion with legislative powers an interesting question has arisen. After many years, the names of Canadians appeared, in 1934, in the honours lists. Honours had fallen into disrepute, and in 1919 the house of commons had passed an address to the crown praying that no further titles of honour or similar distinctions should be conferred on subjects ordinarily resident in Canada, and that every hereditary title held by a person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada should be made to terminate on his death. The former request, up to 1934, was rigidly adhered to, but obviously the second would require legislation in the United Kingdom, and it was not pressed. With the revival of the conferring of honours suggestions have been made that Canada could control them by legislation, and Professor Keith seems to lend some support to this proposal.²

The subject is not without difficulties. First of all, honours conferred by the crown have as a rule validity throughout the empire. Secondly, honours are granted under the prerogative; and, even were the legislature of the United Kingdom to control the prerogative by statute, the statute would not apply to Canada except on Canadian request.³ Thirdly, the prerogative of honours has not passed to the governor-general. Fourthly, honours are conferred on Canadians on the constitutional convention that they are recommended by the Canadian ministry; but responsibility for them lies on the cabinet of the United

¹ Special Committee on the British North America Act: Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, p. 24 (Ottawa, 1935). See Appendix I for the recent judgements (1937) of the judicial committee.

² Constitutional Law of the British Dominions, at p. 38 (London, 1933).

³ Statute of Westminster, 1931 (22 George V, c. 4, s. 4).

Kingdom, which advises the king in relation to a prerogative from which flow honours recognized throughout all the dominions and possessions of the crown. Fifthly, the Canadian intervention is only a custom, and the king can legally bestow honours of this wide validity on any subject, and quite apart from Canadian advice, even though a Canadian cabinet were forbidden by Canadian legislation to forward names to London.

It is obvious that Canada has not the legislative power to pass a statute prohibiting the conferring of honours. It could perhaps negate the use of honours, after their bestowal, within its territories, perhaps prohibit Canadians from using them abroad. It could include those possessing honours among the 'prohibited classes' in the Immigration Act and prevent them landing in Canada. It could create local honours and so can a province; and indeed Quebec at present rejoices in an order of agriculture, with commanders, officers, and knights.¹ Such local honours have merely a local validity within the jurisdiction concerned. There are, however, distinct difficulties arising out of the distribution of legislative powers. Is an honour a 'property' or 'civil right'? Peerages and baronetcies are undoubtedly 'property',² and, I presume, a knighthood being a dignity is a 'civil right'. Would, then, legislation by Canada negating the use of honours within its territory be legal? Are honours, in this connexion, 'property' and 'civil rights', and thus under the exclusive control of the provinces? Or, are they under the control of the federal power to legislate for the 'peace, order and good government' of Canada, within the conception of that term as laid down by Lord Haldane—one exercisable in a time of national emergency, or epidemic of pestilence—and therefore excepted out of the provincial authority? All this seems somewhat absurd, for we might arrive at a situation in which a Canadian citizen

¹ Cf. R. S. Q., 1925, c. 53. See W. P. M. Kennedy, 'The Prerogative of Honours' in 12 Canadian Bar Review (1934), at pp. 375 ff.

² For the dignity of a baronet as property see In re Rivett-Carnac's Will, (1885) 30 Ch. D. 136.

might be 'lord' or 'sir' in one province and plain 'mister' in another. When we consider legislative powers in Canada in relation to honours we come up once more against the 'ungodly jumble' of the British North America Act; but the possibilities of an argument on the subject before the judicial committee suggest infinite varieties of humour, if not indeed of national self-revelation. At any rate, discussions of the subject in Canada will not be in vain, if they clear the air of the idle and farcical belief that honours flow directly from the crown.

iii. Executive powers

There are certain aspects of executive power which call for consideration: disallowance and reservation of statutes, and the relations of the governor-general to his ministers. The developments in relation to provincial legislation can easily be summarized. From 1867 to 1893 there was a clear disposition for the governor-general in council to disallow provincial statutes, not merely as ultra vires, but as inequitable, unjust, confiscatory, violating private rights or natural justice or contracts, or infringing the rights of property. With the constitutional developments in relation to the provinces already discussed in the first part of this treatise, a newer principle governed from 1894 to 1923; it was no business of the governor-general in council to disallow Acts which were of an unjust or outrageous character; the question of ultra vires should be dealt with by the courts, while problems connected with legislation, apparently unjust or oppressive or in conflict with recognized legal principles, should be redressed by the people to whom the provincial legislature was responsible. Legislation might indeed be disallowed if it interfered with contracts to which the dominion was a party or with Canadian treaty-obligations, but the prevailing principles were those which have been mentioned. It may be recalled at this point that disallowance was commonly looked on as a conservative policy, and non-interference characterized liberal ministries.

In 1922 the whole matter was reopened in a remarkable episode.¹ The legislature of Nova Scotia passed a statute, which the liberal minister of justice, Sir Lomer Gouin, described as 'without parallel in the history of Dominion or provincial legislation. Its purpose and effect are to take away from private persons property and rights acquired by them upon the strength of the judgement of the highest court in Canada, in affirmation of the judgement of the highest court of the province, and vest the property in one who, by the judgements of the said courts, originally had no title thereto.' Accordingly, the governor-general, on advice, disallowed the Act.

This exercise of executive authority gave rise to a long debate in the house of commons, in which it is interesting to observe a departure from the older political alinements—the liberals supporting the executive action taken against conservative opposition. The challenge that the statute was entirely intra vires was not denied by the government; while the conservative speakers strongly maintained the autonomy of the province within the legislative ambit of its jurisdiction, and that the executive power in question ought to lapse as the provinces had long since outgrown the rigidity of the strict law. Indeed, their arguments might have been strengthened by the fact that the colonial secretary refused to disallow most objectionable legislation of Queensland in 1920. In reply, government supporters defended the exercise of the executive power, emphasizing the fact that the statute in question annulled judgements years after they had been handed down, on the faith of which moneys had been invested. During the debate two interesting facts emerged. First, the Nova Scotia legislature itself attempted to repeal the statute at the request of the federal government, but the repealing bill did not get beyond second reading owing to the close of the session, although the government made no attempt to push it through with its strong majority in the house of assembly. Secondly, failing to repeal the statute, the Nova Scotia government declared that it had no objection to disallowance provided it were not drawn into a precedent—a crude enough conception of provincial cabinet responsibility, although the prime minister of Canada seemed to think this an important element in justifying the exercise of the executive power.

¹ The entire subject is surveyed in W. P. M. Kennedy, Essays in Constitutional Law, at pp. 61 ff. (Oxford, 1934).

The episode raises some interesting points. If it be granted that the statute was intra vires—and that was not in dispute—then it will always be a serious situation if, by executive action, the federal government constitutes itself a moral censor of provincial legislation undoubtedly legal. All this is an old problem which we have already discussed.¹ But Sir Lomer Gouin advanced a new principle, unknown to our jurisprudence and certainly novel in relation to their executive power. He declared: ‘Whatever may be said on one side or the other, the fact remains that the legislature, in passing the act in question, constituted itself a court of appeal from the supreme court of Canada, thereby removing the case from the judicial tribunals expressly established for the administration of justice in the province.’ He added, in the debate: ‘This Supreme Court . . . [was] created under the B. N. A. Act . . . parliament provided for such a court, and, by implied interpretation, provided at the same time that its judgements should not be affected by provincial legislation.’ It must be conceded at once that the statute was unsound and oppressive, and that it is dangerous to pass legislation annulling judgements on which public faith had relied. These points, however, do not cover Sir Lomer Gouin’s contentions, which certainly stand alone and indeed cannot be supported. The federal legislature has no legislative power to create a court whose judgements lie outside review by a provincial legislature acting within its legislative capacity. It is one thing to disallow an Act as ultra vires—though that matter lies better with the courts; one thing to disallow when the legislation is oppressive. It is quite an indefensible position to disallow on Sir Lomer Gouin's principles, which are entirely contrary to Canadian constitutional practice.

¹ Supra, pp. 415 ff.

There can be little doubt that political wisdom will allow the prerogative of disallowance to fall into disuse. To the problem of protecting the investor, the only wise political answer is that the people of a province must remain the only real guardians of provincial good faith; while the detrimental effects which those outside a province may suffer from inequitable or unjust provincial legislation must remain among those risks which must always be taken, although these very effects may prove, in the final analysis, far stronger deterrents from objectionable legislation than the exercise of the prerogative. In the busy marts of men the maxim 'once bitten twice shy' has more often proved its worth than other forms of protection. It ought to be possible to settle such problems by a definite system of arbitration between the federal and provincial governments, as between two jurisdictions sovereign within their ambits. At any rate, the exercise of the prerogative power is fraught with dangers and is charged with friction.

Under the British North America Act, 1867, the king in council is empowered to disallow any Act of the parliament of Canada within two years of the receipt of the Act from the governor-general. Under the same Act a discretionary power is vested in the governor-general of reserving bills passed by the Canadian parliament in order that his majesty's pleasure may be taken therein. In relation to these prerogative powers the imperial conference of 1930 approved the recommendations of the imperial conference of 1929, and the parliament of Canada followed suit in 1931.

The recommendations with regard to disallowance laid down the broad statement that disallowance could no longer be exercised in relation to federal legislation, and that the legal provisions should be abolished by such changes in the Act as Canada would request. In connexion with reservation, it was agreed that the discretionary power vested in the governor-general could only be exercised in accordance with Canadian constitutional practice, that his majesty's government in the United Kingdom will not advise his majesty the king to give any instructions to the governor-general to reserve bills presented to him for assent, and that it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for advice to be tendered to his majesty, as regards the significance of the king's pleasure concerning a reserved bill, by his majesty's government in the United Kingdom, against the views of the Canadian government. In other words, Canadian constitutional usage is to be followed regarding the prerogative in relation to both matters, while the law can be changed to conform to usage as and when Canada wills. This arrangement adds only a more formal expression of agreement to what has been customary since 1867. It is interesting to note, in the light of what will appear later, that, in the commission and instructions which were in use in relation to the office of governor-general in 1929, it was implied that the discretionary power of disallowance might be exercised.

An important exception was made in the agreements of 1929-31 in relation to the recognition of constitutional custom in the matter of disallowance. Canada accepted the maintenance of the right to disallow federal legislation which might appear to the government of the United Kingdom to alter injuriously to the stockholder any of the provisions affecting colonial stocks admitted to the list of trustee securities in the United Kingdom, or to involve a departure from the original contract. In 1930 when the report of the imperial conference of 1929 was under discussion in the Canadian parliament this arrangement did not escape criticism. The Hon. E. Lapointe saw in it possibilities of preventing Canadian borrowing in the London market; while the Hon. C. H. Cahan criticized the plan in no uncertain terms.¹ In 1931 the prime minister (The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett) seemed disinclined to discuss the subject except to point out that the older scheme, now approved more formally, had owed originally not a little to Canadian activity, that some informal discussions had taken place at the imperial conference of 1930, and that some believed it valuable to maintain the status quo, 'not so much in the case of Canada'.² Once again, we have been left too much in the dark in relation to discussions at imperial conferences.

It would seem, in so far as it is possible to form an opinion, that the arrangements are not peculiarly happy. It may be that they represent an undignified survival of that difference in function amid the principles of 'equality of status' with which the imperial conference of 1926, with a genius worthy of Athanasius, darkened the imperial outlook. As a matter of fact the arrangements could not be made effective, and it would be impossible to exercise the prerogative in a crisis. The New Colonial Stock Act, 1934,³ is hardly more happy. While the ideals of equity and of good faith are to be admitted, their application, either under the agreements of 1929-31, or, by acceptance of the New Colonial Stock Act, are impracticable. It ought to be possible for some permanent body to deal with the issues involved; but the recent imperial conferences were singularly futile in all their dealings which touched judicial or semi-judicial review. Indeed, here again matters are shrouded in mystery; and we know little of the discussions of a proposed commonwealth tribunal⁴ which were passed over without comment in the Canadian parliament in June 1931. The whole scheme for ad hoc tribunals and the obscurity of the phrase

¹ House of Commons Debates (May 26, 1930), p. 2719; (May 30, 1930), pp. 2726-7.

² Ibid. (June 30, 1931), p. 3433.

³ For a discussion of this Act, which is printed in extenso, see W. P. M. Kennedy, 'Colonial Stock Act, 1934' in 1 University of Toronto Law Journal, at pp. 348 ff.

⁴ Proceedings of the Imperial Conference 1930 (Cmd. 3717), pp. 22 ff.

'justiciable disputes' savour more of an arbitral tribunal than of a court. We must deplore the failure in this connexion, which is all the more undignified in the light of obligations assumed in relation to the permanent court of international justice.

Changes in relation to executive power have been most remarkable in connexion with the office of the governor-general. After the Byng episode of 1926, when Lord Byng refused a dissolution to Mr. Mackenzie King and almost immediately granted one to his successor, Mr. Arthur Meighen, it was obvious that discussions of an important nature were in the air. As a consequence the imperial conference of 1926 laid down a principle: 'It is an essential consequence of the equality of status existing among the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations that the governor-general of a Dominion is the representative of the crown holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the Dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain or of any department of that Government.'¹ This statement was approved by the conference of 1930 and implemented in the following terms:

1. The parties interested in the appointment of a governor-general of a Dominion are His Majesty the King, whose representative he is, and the Dominion concerned.
2. The constitutional practice that His Majesty acts on the advice of responsible ministers applies also in this case.
3. The ministers who tender and are responsible for such advice are His Majesty's Ministers in the Dominion concerned.
4. The ministers concerned tender their formal advice after informal consultation with His Majesty.
5. The channel of communication between His Majesty and the Government of any Dominion is a matter solely concerning His Majesty and such government. His Majestys' Government in the United Kingdom have expressed their willingness to continue to act in relation to any of His Majesty's Governments in any manner in which that Government may desire.

¹ Imperial Conference Report 1926, p. 14 (Ottawa, 1926).

6. The manner in which the instrument containing the Governor-General's appointment should reflect the principles set forth above is a matter in regard to which His Majesty is advised by His Ministers in the Dominion concerned.¹

It is well to draw attention to some points. First of all, Canadian opinion at present does not favour the appointment of a Canadian to the office, but expects that its holder will, as John A. Macdonald said in 1879, 'always act on the advice of ministers responsible to him';² and preserve absolute silence in his public utterances on matters of policy or of a public nature.³ Secondly, since he is no longer the agent of the British government in Canada, such work is performed in Ottawa since 1928 by a high commissioner for the United Kingdom. Thirdly, it would seem that such an episode as that of 1926 need not necessarily occur again for, if it did, a governor-general's position would be practically impossible, and the government, which controls his appointment, could advise his recall and on that advice the king must act.

This last point is not without difficulties. If it be, as has been stated, then Canadians must realize that they must rely on their own political wisdom and not on any reserve power in the governor-general to preserve them from arbitrary executive action. The conferences of 1926-30 were not fortunate in this connexion. The central fundamental issue in the Byng episode of 1926 was the fact that there were no precedents or rules to guide, and the protagonists of the issue flitted about among so-called authorities, like counsel in a legal argument working on the principles of stare decisis. In discussing the Byng episode I ventured to point out, in November 1926, before the report of the conference of that year appeared, that 'equality of status' must not mean imitation of the United Kingdom,¹ and I am still strongly of that opinion, which has since received the learned support of Mr. Justice Evatt.² The reports of 1926 and of 1930 are not happy in suggesting that the governor-general is to follow procedure by the king in the United Kingdom. The office of king is a high and mighty one, standing by itself and totally different from that of governor-general, and to argue from one to the other is impossible. In addition, the relationship between the king and his ministers in the United Kingdom is neither permanent, clear, nor definite, and certainly there are no rigid rules. Again, Canada cannot rely on these indefinite and indecisive precedents, which merely provide 'case-law' for argument, and it must work out its own procedure on the principle that the rules of executive authority in the United Kingdom cannot be imitated, for they do not exist as rules; and should not be imitated, if they did exist. We need definite regulations in this connexion. It may be argued that it is difficult to transform rules of practice into rules of law; but there are no rules of practice and if there were, we need not seek them in the United Kingdom. 'Elasticity' is a blessed word, but like many blessed words is too often a shibboleth. We must realize that, if the governor-general is to act always on the advice of his ministers, then the cabinet is supreme and free from all restraint; that, if he is to have a reserve power, then we may have the bandying of authorities all over again; that it is impossible to expect him to follow English precedents for they are neither clear nor applicable.

¹ Imperial Conference Report 1930 (Cmd. 3717), p. 27.

² Parl. Paper, C. 2445, p. 109.

³ In this connexion, the prime minister of Ontario in 1921 administered a courteous but no less emphatic rebuke to the lieutenant-governor for an innocent enough reference in a public speech to a matter at the moment under public discussion (25 Ohio Law Bulletin, No. 9, at pp. 103 ff.).

¹ Contemporary Review, No. 731 (Nov. 1926), pp. 555 ff.

² The King and His Dominion Ministers (Oxford, 1936).

It is also a matter for sincere regret that the office of governor-general has not been rendered a viceroyalty. Whatever the changes may mean in custom or convention, the governor-general still remains an officer whose powers and functions, while ample and adequate for the government of Canada, are defined and definite. He is still under legal liabilities; and all the older judgements and case-law in relation to 'colonial' governors still apply to him, while special statutes of the United Kingdom,¹ over which Canada has no control, govern his conduct and certain aspects of his legal liabilities. We have once again been left too much in the dark over the discussions, and action has been taken which does not hold together as a clear-cut, logical, and dignified whole.

Under the authority of the arrangements laid down by the conference of 1930, certain changes have taken place in Canada. In March 1931 the letters patent of June 1905, constituting the office of governor-general for Canada, were revoked, and the office was reconstituted under new letters patent, with the great seal of the realm in use as provided in English law. In this royal warrant, however, there was inserted for the first time a statement recording the fact that proceedings were being taken on the request and responsibility of the prime minister of Canada, who, in addition, signed the commission. There thus took place a combination of authorities, which doubtless satisfied law and practice, although there does not seem to be any reason why the entire proceedings should not be carried out without any intervention of his majesty's ministers in the United Kingdom, as has been done in the Irish Free State. There would be no difficulties in abolishing the use of the great seal and signet, and in bringing all the formalities into line with the fact that the governor-general is the free choice of the dominion, appointed by the king solely on the advice and responsibility of the Canadian cabinet, and representing only his majesty.

¹ 11 & 12 William III, c. 12; 43 George III, c. 85; 24 & 25 Victoria, c. 100.

Much more interesting, however, are the new instructions. In them there is no longer reference to instructions from the privy council or one of the secretaries of state, while leave of absence can be granted by the prime minister of Canada. Certain 'colonial' vestiges remain. For example, the governor-general is still ordered to transmit all laws assented to by him or reserved by him, with marginal abstracts, along with fair copies of the journals and minutes of the proceedings of the parliament of Canada. It is by no means clear where all this is to be sent by the personal representative of the king, who would not be the least interested in it. Does there exist in London, in spite of all the tumult and the shouting, some museum for the preservation of 'colonial' antiquities, with perhaps a special official in charge of the certificates of colonial stock admitted to the list of trustee securities? In addition, the governor-general is still ordered, in case a pardon or reprieve would affect interests outside Canadian jurisdiction, to take those special interests into his personal consideration in conjunction with ministerial advice. Such an instruction is singularly inexpert, as personal action under it would be out of the question, while there is an implication that a Canadian cabinet would not act with just as much wisdom and justice as the governor himself in the situation contemplated.

Why the Canadian government fathered such an obscurantist document is a mystery. It has been suggested that the instructions were necessary in the light of the British North America Act. It would be much simpler to give the governor-general a copy of the Act and leave it at that. The defence, however, proves either too little or too much, for (i) on the argument, we should expect to find in the instructions full and explicit reference to everything connected with the governor-general to which reference is made in the British North America Act; (ii) there is no reference in that Act to sending to England Canadian statutes with 'marginal abstracts' or fair copies of the parliamentary journals and minutes; (iii) the whole form and tone of the instructions are contrary to the spirit and resolutions of the imperial conferences of 1926-30.¹

iv. Diplomatic representation

Canada has entered the field of diplomacy. The subject is almost as old as federation, and proposals for action have appeared from time to time in discussions and resolutions of the house of commons. In 1918 it was found necessary to establish a Canadian war mission at Washington, and the whole matter was taken up by Sir Robert Borden with the prime minister of the United Kingdom and with the foreign and colonial secretaries. An arrangement was entered into and announced to the house of commons on May 10, 1920. His majesty agreed, on the advice of his Canadian ministers, to appoint a minister plenipotentiary in charge of Canadian affairs at Washington, who would be the ordinary channel of communication between the United States government in matters of purely Canadian concern, acting upon instructions from and reporting direct to the Canadian government, and, in the absence of the British ambassador, taking over the whole embassy and the representation of imperial as well as Canadian interests. He would be accredited to the president of the United States for the purpose, while the new arrangement would denote, on the part of either of his majesty's governments, no departure from the diplomatic unity of the empire, but would emphasize the importance of Canadian interests at Washington and the desire to strengthen friendly relations and co-operation with the United States.² The prime minister of England welcomed the proposal at the imperial conference of 1921.³ The issues did not pass unchallenged in

¹ The letters patent and instructions of 1931 are to be found in the prefix to the Statutes of Canada, 21 George V; 21 & 22 George V (1930, 1931). The commission is added in Can. Sess. Pap. (1931), No. 505.

² House of Commons Debates, May 10, 1920.

³ Cmd. 1474, pp. 13 ff.

Canada and the parliamentary debates on the subject were characterized by all the older objections and theories against constitutional progress. In other dominions the proposals were not welcome. Australia did not approve of the idea that a Canadian should be in charge of imperial interests, New Zealand feared a break in the diplomatic unity—all this in spite of the fact that, while the appointment would be made on Canadian advice, legal responsibility would lie with the secretary of state for foreign affairs.

For some years no action was taken in Canada, for reasons at present obscure. Meanwhile, the Irish Free State hurried matters, and in 1924, a British note to the president of the United States explained that a Free State minister would be accredited by the king to the president, that he would deal with Free State affairs, that matters which were of imperial concern or affected other dominions in common with the Free State would be handled by the British embassy and that the arrangements would constitute no break in diplomatic unity. Of course, there was no proposal that the Free State minister should act for the empire in the absence of the British ambassador or indeed that he should conclude treaties.¹ These arrangements served to clear the air of at least some fears, although as yet we do not know the real reasons for Canadian delays. However, on December 7, 1926, the king issued letters of credence to the president of the United States announcing the appointment of the Hon. Vincent Massey as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary with the special object of representing in the United States the interests of our Dominion of Canada. It is interesting to note that these letters of credence make no reference to the handling of imperial affairs in the absence of the British ambassador.² In due course the United States appointed a minister plenipotentiary to Canada.³ Since then Canadian ministers have been appointed to Paris and Tokyo, while France and Japan send ministers to Ottawa. These foreign ministers at Ottawa enjoy such immunities as they would receive in London in the light of English interpretation of diplomatic privileges in international law.

¹ Cmd. 2764.

² Kennedy, Statutes, Treaties, &c., p. 712.

³ Ibid., p. 713.

The letters of credence of Canadian ministers to foreign countries are issued through the British foreign secretary. While it is clear that they are free from all control either by the British government or the British representative, yet this formal procedure remains, and it creates in the foreign secretary a responsibility which he cannot shed. On the other hand, changes lie with Canada, and there is no reason why Canada should not act in a manner quite independent of any cabinet minister in the United Kingdom, or why the envelope enclosing the letters of credence should not be sealed with a Canadian fob seal. Perhaps the matter is at the moment academic; but it might be well to shoulder full responsibility, as it is somewhat undignified to leave it de jure with the foreign secretary, where de facto he is helpless not to act on Canadian advice. In this respect, where he takes action as a minister responsible to the parliament of the United Kingdom, he ought not to be advised or his choice controlled by the Canadian cabinet.

v. Treaty-making

We have already recorded Sir Robert Borden's statesmanship in relation to the peace treaties and in successfully asserting claims to the rights of Canada to sign. Equally influential has been the attitude of his successors in office. Mr. Mackenzie King was responsible for reasserting Sir Robert Borden's principles when objections were made in 1923, and once again he vindicated, in the halibut fishery treaty of that year, the right of Canada to sign alone for Canada, and apart from any representative of the United Kingdom.¹ This procedure formed the basis of discussion at the imperial conference of 1923 where Mr. King's action was approved and amplified. Canada can make any treaty through its own individual representatives, but subject to the rule that other parts of the empire must be informed of Canadian intent to negotiate, so that an opportunity should thus be given for joint action if necessary or desired, or at least for consultation. At the same time the conference made it clear that no one part of the empire should itself purport to impose obligations on any of the other parts.¹

¹ Cmd. 2377.

Mr. King applied these principles with sound reasoning in relation to the treaty of Lausanne. The government of the United Kingdom had apparently assumed that Canada would bring the new convention before parliament for approval prior to ratification, in spite of the fact that the British government, yielding apparently to objections from France, had not obtained special Canadian representation at the Lausanne conference. Mr. King, while acknowledging that Canada, de jure, would be bound by the ratification of the crown, argued with clarity that, as Canada had not been a separate party to the treaty and had been refused participation in the preliminaries, Canada should not have imposed on it obligations at the instance of the government of another part of the empire, and that Canada would remain absolutely free to decide what aid, if any, it would give should war arise, in carrying out the obligations flowing from the crown's ratification.²

This whole experience had undoubted influence on the conference of 1926, where Mr. King once more led the discussions, and a special committee of that conference, under the significant chairmanship of the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who alone had signed the halibut treaty, presented a report³ on treaty-procedure which was approved by the imperial conference of 1926 as a whole, and homologated by the imperial conference of 1930.⁴ It was

¹ Cmd. 1987, pp. 13 ff.

² House of Commons Debates (June 9, 1924).

³ Imperial Conference Report, 1926, pp. 17 ff. (Ottawa, 1926).

⁴ Cmd. 3717, pp. 27 ff.

definitely decided that Canada must be a participant in any treaty negotiations which purported to impose any obligations on it. The agreements of 1923 were strengthened, and it was laid down, where Canada intends to negotiate and so informs another government, that that government should indicate its attitude with reasonable promptitude, and that Canada may assume that, so long as no adverse comments are received and so long as its policy involves no active obligations on the part of other governments, its policy is generally acceptable. In addition, the conference of 1926 revived and approved Sir Robert Borden's eminently practical doctrines of 1919.¹ The crown in future will appoint plenipotentiaries in such a way as to indicate clearly those parts of the empire which will be bound by their signatures, and thus will disappear the idea that a treaty is capable of being interpreted as binding on any part of the empire which was not bound by individual and separate signature: 'all treaties (other than agreements between governments) whether negotiated under the auspices of the League or not should be made in the name of heads of States, and, if a treaty is signed on behalf of any or all the Governments of the Empire, the Treaty should be made in the name of the King as a symbol of the special relationship between the different parts of the Empire. The British units on behalf of which the treaty is signed should be grouped together in the following order: Great Britain and Northern Ireland and all the parts of the British Empire which are not separate members of the League, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State, India. . . . In the case of a treaty applying to only one part of the Empire it should be stated to be made by the King on behalf of that part.'²

Formally, indeed, the intervention of the government of the United Kingdom still remains; and, as long as Canada desires to follow procedure where treaties are signed by Canadian plenipotentiaries appointed by the king under the great seal of the realm and are ratified by the king under the great seal, then members of the cabinet in the United Kingdom must intervene. This procedure is not in itself any evidence of inferiority of status, and, indeed, Professor Keith believes that it is purely facultative.¹ On the other hand, just as in the appointment of a Canadian diplomatic minister, it is difficult to see how the British cabinet minister can shed responsibility; and it would seem definitely wiser, and with no real change in the treaty-making structure at present existing, if Canada assumed full responsibilities under its own seals and ministers. It is unfair to lay responsibilities on a British minister which are in truth Canadian. Responsibility in the fullest sense should follow the facts.

¹ Canada in the Commonwealth, pp. 101 ff. (Oxford, 1929).

² Imperial Conference Report 1926, p. 19 (Ottawa, 1926).

Further, the imperial conference of 1926 made it clear that the relations inter se of the parts of the empire are not relations governed by international law. In addition, agreements were reached and communicated to the league of nations in 1927 by the foreign secretary that, in order to avoid confusion in relation to treaties which may be concluded under the auspices of the league and may require for their effect a specified number of ratifications, each member of the league should count as a unit.²

¹ Constitutional Law of the British Dominions, at p. 52 (London, 1933).

² For the relation of Canada to the London reparations conference, 1924; the Locarno negotiations, 1925; the conference on the limitation of armaments, 1927; the Briand-Kellogg pact, 1928; The Hague conferences, 1929 and 1930; the conference on the reduction of naval armaments, 1930, see G. H. Palmer, Consultation and Co-operation in the British Commonwealth, pp. 132 ff., 155 (Oxford, 1934).

CHAPTER XXVIII

CANADA AND THE STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER, 1931

As far as Canada is concerned, any discussion of the Statute of Westminster¹ must be preceded by a survey of events in Canada, without which its form cannot be understood from the Canadian point of view. In July 1930 the liberal ministry, which had represented Canada at the imperial conferences of 1926-9 and was responsible in May 1930 for submitting the report of the latter conference to the approval of the parliament of Canada, was defeated at a general election. In August 1930 the conservatives, who had criticized in parliament the report of 1929, which contained virtually the Statute of Westminster, took office with Mr. R. B. Bennett as prime minister, and to this cabinet fell the duty of representing Canada at the imperial conference called for September 1930. However, Mr. Bennett was virtually committed to the report of 1929 as he had not divided the legislature on it; and it is well to quote Mr. Bennett himself, addressing the house of commons on June 30, 1931: 'I at once made the announcement to the conference [of September 1930] that I had voted in this house for the adoption of the 1929 report, and that I did not propose to change my view merely because my status had been changed.'²

The report of the conference of 1929 contained a statement, for purposes of the proposed Statute of Westminster, to the following effect: 'Nothing in this act shall be deemed to confer any power to repeal or alter the constitution act[s] of the Dominion of Canada . . . otherwise than in accordance with the law and constitutional usage and practice heretofore existing.'³

¹ 22 George V, c. 4. ² House of Commons Debates (June 30, 1931), p. 3436.

³ Report of the Conference of 1929, p. 29 (Ottawa, 1930).

In the light of this statement, the conservative prime minister of Ontario (Mr. Howard G. Ferguson) addressed a strongly worded memorandum to the prime minister of Canada, recalling two important points. First, that Mr. Mackenzie King, as prime minister, had declared that the house of commons was practically unanimous in its view that, if authority were to be sought to give the parliament of Canada power to amend the constitution, due regard should be had to what Mr. Ferguson called the compact of confederation, and that the request for such a power should only be made after a conference and agreement with the provinces. Secondly, he pointed out that, at the dominion-provincial conference of 1927, Mr. Ernest Lapointe (then minister of justice) proposed that power should be granted by the parliament of the United Kingdom to confer on the federal legislature powers to change the constitution, subject to the rule that for ordinary amendments the consent of the legislatures of a majority of the provinces would be necessary, while, for vital and more fundamental changes, such as the rights of the provinces, of minorities, of race, language, and creed, the unanimous consent of the provinces would be required. The dominion-provincial conference of 1927 rejected not only Mr. Lapointe's proposals but all others looking to the grant of constituent powers. Finally, Mr. Ferguson, seeing that the report of 1929 contemplated changes in connexion with the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865,¹ disapproved of the statement, which I have just quoted from that report, as vague and inconclusive, and declared 'that no restatement of the procedure for amending the constitution of Canada can be accepted by the province of Ontario that does not fully and frankly acknowledge the right of all the provinces to be consulted and to become parties to the decision arrived at'. Mr. Taschereau, the liberal prime minister of Quebec, strongly supported Mr. Ferguson's memorandum. To run counter to the considerations thus urged would have been rash and unwise. When, then, Mr. Bennett, at the conference of 1930, approved, as far as he could, the draft of the proposed Statute of Westminster, he did so with the reference to the 'constitution act of the Dominion of Canada' deleted from the report of 1929 as approved by the conference of 1930, and with the understanding that resolutions would not be submitted to the federal legislature with a view to the enactment of the proposed statute by the parliament of the United Kingdom until 'the representations of the provinces have received consideration'.¹

¹ 28 & 29 Victoria, c. 63.

In the light of this understanding a dominion-provincial conference was called in April 1931 with the result that a unanimous agreement was reached. There is, however, no evidence forthcoming that, at this dominion-provincial conference, the government of Canada requested provincial consent to the matter of the Dominion of Canada coming within the ambit of the Statute of Westminster or that the provinces did assent to such application to Canada as distinct from the provinces. The agreements reached were embodied in the resolution accepted by the federal legislature in June 1931 on which Canadian consent to the proposed legislation by the parliament of the United Kingdom was based, and in due course the agreements were embodied in the Statute of Westminster. The results have been that the constitution of Canada is carefully guarded, as we shall see, and that, as the dominion-provincial conference insisted, the provisions of the Statute of Westminster in relation to the Colonial Laws Validity Act and to the doctrine of repugnancy have been extended to the provinces. Indeed, there can be little doubt that the provinces owe not a little to Mr. C. H. Cahan in this latter connexion, as he drew attention to the matter in the house of commons on May 26, 1930.²

With this account of the Canadian preliminaries to the Statute

¹ Report of the Conference of 1930 (Cmd. 3717), p. 20.

² House of Commons Debates (May 26, 1930), pp. 2729-30.

of Westminster, it is now possible to examine that Act from the following points of view: (i) the recitals and definitions; (ii) the Colonial Laws Validity Act; the doctrines of repugnancy and of extraterritoriality, where an opportunity will be given to discuss judicial appeals; (iii) safeguarding the British North America Act, where an opportunity will be given to discuss constituent powers; (iv) merchant shipping, &c., concluding (v) with some thoughts on methods of interpreting the statute.

i. The recitals and definitions

Seldom have the recitals of a statute so little relation to the enacting clauses; but their worth will be more fully considered in another connexion. They have at least a fine moral value. That the Britannic nations are 'united by a common allegiance to the crown' expresses a fact which Canadians would preserve, at present, at the expense of any claim to the right of secession or to the creation of a personal union. Canada accepts, too, as worthy of her status, that in future any change in the royal style and titles should require the assent of the parliament of Canada—a position agreed on at the conferences of 1926–30. In this connexion we may note that this agreed position laid it down that subject to his majesty's approval the king's title should read: 'George V, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India.' On May 13, 1927, under the authority of the Royal and Parliamentary Titles Act,¹ the king issued a royal proclamation changing his style and title to that just recorded. It is, however, interesting to note that the Latin form² as given in this proclamation—'Georgius V, Dei Gratia, Magnae Britanniae, Hiberniae, et terrarum transmarinarum quae in ditone sunt Britannica Rex, Fidei Defensor, Indiae Imperator'—conveys an extraordinary version of the

¹ 17 George V, c. 4.

² For a curious proposed use of the Latin form in South Africa see W. P. M. Kennedy in 1 University of Toronto Law Journal, at p. 140.

English form as agreed on and included in the proclamation, and certainly represents an idea of subordination totally out of keeping with the principles of equality so laboriously enumerated by the conference of 1926, and with that scheme of free association suitable to equal nations and embodied in the recitals to the Statute of Westminster. In addition, while the enacting clauses of that statute define the word 'Dominion' to include the 'Dominions' as we know them and as agreed on at the colonial conference of 1907,¹ it is unfortunate that the word 'dominions' should continue to be used in the English of the royal title, where it undoubtedly has a territorial meaning in the widest sense, and is apparently, as will appear later, of Canadian origin. The use of 'Dominions' and 'dominions' is confusing, and it is hoped that our political genius will arrive at some royal title more specific for the Dominions. Indeed, nothing would be more welcome than the mention of Canada in that title, especially as the Statute of Westminster enacts that neither Canada nor its provinces shall be referred to as 'colonies' in any future statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

The suggestion here made is not perhaps without legal difficulties, to say nothing of cumbrousness in expression; but it affords an opportunity to recall an episode in Canadian constitutional history, which appears to have escaped all notice, and lies buried in a parliamentary paper.² On January 29, 1901, Chamberlain sent a confidential telegram to the governor-general of Canada in the following terms: 'King Edward's accession offers an opportunity of considering the Monarch's titles, and I am very desirous that the separate and greatly increased importance of the Colonies should be recognized if possible. I therefore venture to suggest "King of Great Britain and Ireland and of Greater Britain beyond the Seas". It is possible that some of the self-governing Colonies might desire more special recognition as King of Canada, King of Australia, but this would give rise to very great difficulties. Other self-governing Colonies, viz., New Zealand, Newfoundland, the Cape of Good Hope, and Natal, could hardly be excluded. It would be also desirable to refer to the Crown Colonies, all of which would be covered by the expression which I propose. I request that you will consult your Ministers most confidentially and enquire whether such recognition by the King would be gratifying to them, and, if so, whether they approve of the proposed style.'

¹ See Cd. 3523, p. v.

² Cmd. 708, pp. 3 ff.

On February 9, 1901, Lord Minto sent the following reply: 'Referring to your telegram of the 29th January, respecting the King's title, my Responsible Advisers desire me to express their high appreciation of your action in inviting the opinion of the Government of Canada on this important matter. They recognize the desirability, if the result can be reached without inconvenience, of making His Majesty's titles convey, not only to His own subjects but to Foreign Powers as well, some idea of the world-wide character of the Empire over which He rules. They entertain some doubt as to the appropriateness of the expression "Greater Britain", which, while convenient colloquially, is perhaps hardly definite or intelligible enough for such a formal purpose. They would therefore suggest for consideration the expediency of retaining the title of King of Great Britain and Ireland and Emperor of India, and adding the words "King of Canada, Australasia, South Africa, and all the British Dominions beyond the Seas"; but if the mention of greater Colonies be deemed unfair to remainder of smaller Colonies, or otherwise objectionable, the addition to the title might be "King of all the British Dominions beyond the Seas". The repetition of the word "King" in the title would perhaps be open to criticism, in which case, the word "Sovereign" might be used as a suitable synonym. The King's titles would then be "King of Great Britain and Ireland, Emperor of India, and Sovereign of all the British Dominions beyond the Seas".'

The correspondence has some historical interest. It discloses that Canada was responsible for the term 'British Dominions beyond the Seas'; while there is something of dignity in the suggested term 'King of Canada, &c.'. At any rate the proposal, which has had its strong advocates in Canada during recent years, and especially since the imperial conference of 1926, is not so new as some may think, for as long ago as 1901 the mind of the Canadian cabinet was turning back to John A. Macdonald's hope that in 1867 the designation 'Kingdom of Canada' would dignify the new federation.¹

Finally, in connexion with the recitals it is clear Canadian opinion that no law made by the parliament of the United Kingdom shall extend to Canada, as part of the law in force in Canada, otherwise than at the request of and with the consent of the Dominion declared in the Act—a recital incorporated in the enacting clauses. Here, however, it is worthy of note that the words 'as part of the law in force in that Dominion' were inserted at the conference of 1930 as, without them, the clause might have the effect of preventing an Act of the parliament of the United Kingdom passed hereafter from having the operation which the legislation of one state normally has in relation to the territory of another.² It is true that certain fears were expressed about the insertion of these words, but Canada was satisfied with the assurance expressed by the conference of 1930, apart from all law, that the words imply no claim for legislation wider than the comity of nations permits.

It is of interest to note that this power of legislation, on request from Canada, for Canada, apparently preserves the wide scope of the legislative power of the parliament of the United Kingdom; but it would be a work of supererogation to enter into a discussion of the nature of its sovereignty. Professor Keith is perhaps wisely content to acknowledge the fact, with the important statement that 'it is equally clear that it can declare a constitutional principle which will be far more binding than any mere law'.¹ Perhaps it might be as well to leave the Statute of Westminster to that principle, and to believe that the parliament of the United Kingdom can, but dare not, repeal it apart from dominion consent. On the other hand, it is necessary to record other opinions. Dr. W. I. Jennings would appear to believe that the statute is binding on future legislatures of the United Kingdom;² Mr. Justice Dixon has said that the recital and clause just discussed impose a restriction on British parliamentary supremacy over the law.³ Somewhat similar suggestions were once made by Sir William Anson in a moot case not entirely unlike the situation under the Statute of Westminster.⁴ Lord Sankey has indeed remarked that 'in theory' and 'as a matter of abstract law' the parliament of the United Kingdom might disregard or repeal the recital and clause;⁵ but, in the latest discussion of the subject, Mr. Justice Evatt appears to favour the other side.⁶ The point is worthy of legal consideration; but it need not cause much concern to tickle our ears with legal dogmas. We have had our battles in Canada over what Lord Durham, almost a century ago, called 'a barren and injurious sovereignty';⁷ and, in 1937, we recall the Canadian rebellions exactly a hundred years ago, which were fundamentally issues over sovereign claims. One thing is clear, without equivocation and reserve: any attempt by the parliament of the United Kingdom to legislate for Canada, or to tamper with the Statute of Westminster, apart from a request from and with the consent of Canada, would simply mean a declaration of independence.⁸ Legal ¹ Introduction, p. xxx, to Speeches and Documents . . . 1918-1931 (Oxford, 1932). ² The Law and the Constitution, chapter iv (London, 1933).

¹ Supra, pp. 314–15.

² Cmd. 3717, p. 18.

³ 48 Law Quarterly Review, at p. 456.

⁴ 2 Law Quarterly Review, at p. 440.

⁵ British Coal Corporation v. The King, [1935] A. C. at p. 520.

⁶ The King and His Dominion Governors, at p. 309 (Oxford, 1936).

⁷ Lord Durham's Report, ed. Lucas, vol. ii, p. 264 (Oxford, 1912).

⁸ Cf. Mr. McGilligan (agreeing with General Hertzog) in the Dail (Irish Debates, Dail, vol. xxxix, July 17, 1931).

principles, if such indeed exist, must yield to social facts, if the very situation of dissolution which the champions of Austin's creed would undoubtedly desire to avoid is for the future to be prevented. Imperial legislative sovereignty and imperial unity will not work harmoniously in harness together.

ii. The Colonial Laws Validity Act. The doctrines of repugnancy and extraterritoriality; judicial appeals

The Colonial Laws Validity Act will no longer apply to any law made by the federal or provincial legislatures, and no Act of any legislature in Canada will be void as being repugnant to a statute in the parliament of the United Kingdom. In addition, Canadian legislatures acquire the right to repeal any such Act of the parliament of the United Kingdom in so far as it is the law in Canada or any of its provinces, subject of course to the condition that these powers conferred on the federal legislatures and on the provincial legislatures shall be restricted to matters within their respective legislative competency.

The federal legislature acquires for its laws a statutory declaration of their unqualified extraterritorial effect. It is somewhat difficult to follow the history. The imperial conference of 1926 suggested that the conference of 1929 shall discuss 'the practicability and most convenient method' of giving extraterritorial effect to the laws of a dominion 'where such operation is ancillary to provision for the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion'.¹ The imperial conference of 1929, with no disclosed catena of reasons, did not accept this limitation, and, boldly exceeding their reference, agreed on the general terms accepted by the imperial conference of 1930² and incorporated in the Statute of Westminster.

It is impossible to arrive at the reasons which moved the representatives of Canada to accept this unqualified grant, especially as it went beyond the limitation placed on the power in the parliament of Canada in 1924. Certain reasons may, with some confidence, be suggested. First of all, had the qualification 'ancillary to provision for the peace, order, and good government' of Canada been accepted, it would have led to much confusion, in that it might have been interpreted to mean only power ancillary to the general legislative power of the dominion—perhaps as limited by Lord Haldane—and not ancillary to its enumerated powers, and thus we might have been landed in a serious controversial situation, with endless litigation to which the provinces might have been parties. In addition, Canada has wide powers under section 132 of the British North America Act, 1867, in treaty-making, and the limitation under discussion of the extraterritorial power, had it appeared in the Statute of Westminster, might have been interpreted to imply something detrimental to Canadian interests under this section and to its general practical administration. When the serious judicial conflicts are recalled over legislative powers in Canada, it was undoubtedly wise not to complicate them further.

¹ Imperial Conference Report 1926, p. 15 (Ottawa, 1926).

² Cmd. 3717, p. 19.

Finally, in this connexion, some attention must be paid to the criticism that the power should have been limited to Canadian nationals. Had, however, it been so limited, Canada, as an immigration country, might have found itself deprived of power in relation to deportation; and certainly we might have been tying our hands without knowing it in such necessary and important matters, for example, as extradition and shipping. In addition, section 132 of the British North America Act once more raised problems. For example, a reciprocal treaty with the United States in the matter of seizing hovering ships might be robbed of its effective purposes were extraterritorial power limited to Canadian nationals. Indeed, the limitation might have led to long processes in the courts, and the parliament of Canada might well have refused to implement a treaty which implied the arrest of others than Canadian nationals.

The Colonial Laws Validity Act, repugnancy and extraterritoriality appeared, on the eve of the imperial conference of 1926, in an important setting. In 1888 a section of the Canadian Criminal Code forbade appeals in criminal cases to the judicial committee of the privy council. In 1926, in Nadan v. The King,¹ this section was declared ultra vires, on the grounds that its effective worth depended on extraterritorial power which a dominion statute could not have, and because it was repugnant to the Privy Council Acts,² applying to Canada, and which Canada could not alter or repeal. At the imperial conference of 1926 the following statement was accepted: 'Another matter which we discussed, in which a general constitutional principle was raised, concerned the conditions governing appeals from judgements in the Dominions to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. From these discussions it became clear that it was no part of the policy of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain that questions affecting judicial appeals should be determined otherwise than in accordance with the wishes of the part of the empire primarily affected. It was, however, generally recognized, that where changes in the existing system were proposed which, while primarily affecting one part, raised issues in which other parts were concerned, such changes ought only to be carried out after consultation and discussion'³—an obvious reference to the fact that the Anglo-Irish treaty of 1921⁴ applied the status of Canada to the Irish Free State, where difficulties over the matter of appeals at the moment existed. It is necessary also to remember that the conference of 1926 gave no special reference on this matter to the conference of 1929, and that appeals were not specifically dealt with in the Statute of Westminster. However, on the passing of that statute, Canada re-enacted the clause of the criminal code⁵ declared ultra vires in

¹ [1926] A. C. 482.

² 3 & 4 William IV, c. 41; 7 & 8 Victoria, c. 69.

³ Imperial Conference Report 1926, p. 16 (Ottawa, 1926).

⁴ 13 George V, c. 1.

⁵ 23 & 24 George V, c. 53, s. 17.

the Nadan Case, and awaited the issues which came in 1935, when the judicial committee of the privy council decided that this re-enactment was intra vires, that the Privy Council Acts completely covered the prerogative of appeals, and that Canada had power, since the Statute of Westminster had so effectively dealt with the Colonial Laws Validity Act and the doctrines of repugnancy and extraterritoriality as to make the ratio decidendi of the Nadan Case no longer of application, to control the prerogative of appeals by appropriate legislation in Canada.¹

It has been in some degree argued that the Statute of Westminster did not deal with appeals at all, founded as it was on the conferences of 1929 and 1930 to which the conference of 1926 did not refer the matter.² It is now fair to fill out the history. I had long argued for a British Act giving any dominion the clear right to bar appeals, and I also believed that, on the balance, the Privy Council Acts fully controlled the prerogative. After the conference of 1926 Canada took up a very definite position, which no one at the conferences of 1929 or 1930 was in any position to know. While there was a hope for a general discussion of the matter in 1929 or even in 1930, I saw that apparent political expediency ruled out this hope and I advised that Canada should abandon it altogether and not refer to appeals, should strongly concentrate in 1929 and, if necessary, in 1930 on the Colonial Laws Validity Act, repugnancy, and extraterritoriality, on effective dealing with them in the Statute of Westminster, then re-enact, as was done, the section of the criminal code declared ultra vires in the Nadan Case, and await a challenge, as happened in the British Coal Corporation Case, which could be met with the plea that the Privy Council Acts completely controlled the prerogative—a position, as we have seen, vindicated by the judicial committee. Canada acted, in relation to judicial appeals from 1926 to the passing of the Statute of Westminster and thereafter, with its eyes quite open and fully aware of what it was doing and intended to do.

¹ British Coal Corporation v. The King, (1935) 51 T. L. R. 508. Cf. W. P. M. Kennedy in 13 Canadian Bar Review (1935), at pp. 621 ff.

² Cf. W. I. Jennings in 52 Law Quarterly Review (1936), at pp. 173 ff.

On the wider issue in the future much need not be said. If appeals continue, it is because Canada does not, at present, wish further to exercise its undoubted legal powers to abolish or curtail them. The legal profession, not unnaturally, is generally in favour of them, while among many Canadians there survive peculiar ideas that they guard minorities, in spite of a long line of decisions against minorities;¹ that they are a bond of empire, in spite of Australian, Irish, and even Canadian history; that they constitute the immemorial right to go to the footsteps of the throne, in spite of history and of law. On the other hand, evidence is not wanting to disclose that the opinion is gaining ground that appeals to the judicial committee favour wealthy suitors at the expense of poor litigants, and that if Canada and its provinces enjoy absolute autonomy in legislation, interpretation should be made finally in Canada.² It is also interesting to note that the attorney-general of Quebec was represented in the British Coal Corporation Case along with counsel for the attorney-general of Canada in favour of the dominion restricting legislation in question. More significant are the utterances of distinguished public men. Thus, in 1918, Sir Robert Borden had definite ideas on the subject.³ In 1931 Mr. S. St. Laurent declared, as president of the Canadian bar association: 'There is no doubt a growing feeling in Canada that, at least in ordinary disputes between parties, final decisions should be arrived at in our own courts. . . . I have no doubt that some day ordinary clients will be content . . . to accept their fate from our own Canadian courts.'⁴

¹ F. R. Scott, 'The Privy Council and Minority Rights' in Queen's Quarterly (1930), pp. 668 ff.

² Cf. Hon. E. Lapointe in House of Commons Debates (June 30, 1931).

³ Supra, p. 398.

⁴ 9 Canadian Bar Review (1931), at p. 535.

More significant is the statement of the present minister of justice, the Hon. E. Lapointe, one of the most distinguished holders of that office. Speaking at Montreal, on January 16, 1932, he said: 'Je ne puis trouver une seule raison justifiant le Canada d'être le seul pays au monde de son rang, sa population, et son intelligence à confesser son incompétence à décider lui-même ses conflits judiciaires. . . . Notre magistrature et notre barreau n'ont rien à envier à ceux d'aucun autre pays. Les partisans de l'appel au Conseil Privé disent qu'il est un lien entre les Dominions et la Couronne, qu'il procure à tout citoyen britannique le droit d'aller au pied du trône pour avoir justice, et surtout qu'il est une protection pour les minorités. D'abord, il n'est pas vrai que tous les citoyens britanniques vont au pied du trône par l'entremise du Conseil Privé . . . si l'on se rappelle les conflits en Irlande, en Australie et même au Canada, à la suite de certains jugements du Conseil Privé, il est difficile d'y trouver un lien puissant avec la Couronne. . . . Quant à la protection des droits minoritaires par le Conseil Privé, c'est une légende . . . je veux attaquer ce fantôme, ce mythe du Conseil Privé protecteur des droits minoritaires à l'encontre de notre Cour Suprême. Et je supplie mes compatriotes de ne pas se prêter aux manœuvres des réactionnaires qui ont combattu chaque développement de l'autonomie canadienne, et qui proclament avec jactance que c'est Québec qui maintiendra le droit d'appel en Angleterre. Nos droits et nos traditions, nous en sommes nous-mêmes la meilleure protection et la sauvegarde la plus sûre. Aucune autorité en dehors du pays ne saurait les protéger efficacement à notre place. Le Canada est maintenant majeur, il peut se passer de tutelle, même judiciaire.'¹

We can afford to leave the matter with Mr. Lapointe's opinion, gathering up as it does a good deal of floating, if less influential, sentiment.

¹ Le Statut de Westminster et l'évolution du Canada, pp. 17-19 (Montréal, 1932).

iii. Safeguarding the British North America Act; constituent powers

The Statute of Westminster provides: 'Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven and nineteen hundred and thirty or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.' To explain this section would be to write a whole chapter of history of which we have already said enough to disclose the position and the sentiments as they existed in 1921.¹ It would be foolish to argue once more the basis of federation, but no one seriously believes that there is anything in it either of a treaty or a contract—dogmas of Canadians and dicta of the judicial committee notwithstanding.² The simple facts are that the whole problem of constituent powers is one full of political dangers; and it would seem evident that real progress towards the creation of a method of constitutional change to be exercised solely in Canada must proceed from at least substantial provincial agreement. Such a proceeding is statesmanlike in that it would avoid raising once more the old battle-cries over provincial rights, and it would tend to create conditions for constructive national purposes. For the moment, however, it is well to point out that the Statute of Westminster implies that the parliament of the United Kingdom will legislate at the request of the dominion, and thus is preserved the traditional method of constitutional changes on addresses from the federal legislature. There is, of course, in law no necessity for the federal legislature to consult the provinces; and it is idle to think that the government of the United Kingdom would, to-day, refuse legislation homologating such an address or delay action until provincial agreement were reached. Such action, however, on the part of a Canadian ministry would be extremely unwise, worse than a mistake—a blunder; but it is well to recognize its legal possibility.

¹ Supra, pp. 450–1.

² See N. McL. Rogers, 'The Compact Theory of Confederation' in 9 Canadian Bar Review (1931), at pp. 395 ff. It has been most unfortunate that the dicta of the judicial committee in this connexion have fortified a point of view impossible to support either historically or legally.

The truth is that we have outgrown the British North America Act. Canada is attempting to-day to carry on the highly complex life of a modern state under a constitution drawn up for a primitive community, scarcely emerging from pioneer agricultural conditions. Dangers have accumulated, which present conditions have accentuated; and nine provinces, individually and separately, are attempting to deal with a vast network of national complexities, with the dominion driven from field after field by judicial decisions. Provincial 'rights' have become national wrongs. In addition, we have laboured too long under a peculiarly barren mentality which has looked on the British North America Act as a kind of ark of the covenant, to which has been given something akin to primitive ancestor worship. It is true that men of insight and wisdom belonging to all political parties have long seen dangers ahead and called for processes of constitutional change; but in a small community legal insight and political wisdom are forced too often to retire before this strange bowing-down in the groves of a far-off constitutional event. At any rate, to-day, there are cracks and strainings in the legal underpinnings of our national life, and it is more than obvious to the nation that the British North America Act is not a sacred and inviolate constitutional charter—1867 has lost much of its glamour in the stark reality of national affairs. We do not dispute the magnificent creative faith of that year, any more than we dispute the creative work of Noah—we simply see it in its just and proper historical setting. The question, then, is no longer one of the inviolate nature of the constitution, but one of arriving at some method to make it a suitable and elastic instrument of modern government. Amid many discussions and proposals two important events may be noted. In February 1935 a special committee of the house of commons was appointed to consider the subject; and the evidence given before it, with the discussion of various proposals, is a real contribution to the elucidation of difficulties.¹ I made certain suggestions before that committee to which later I shall refer. At a dominion-provincial conference, held in December 1935, further advance was made; and the province of Ontario presented a method² of amending the British North America Act substantially based on the drafts which I submitted to the parliamentary committee. At present a good deal of quiet work is going on, progress is being made and substantial provincial agreement has been reached on certain points. It is, of course, impolitic to hurry matters; but such definite advances have been made already that we can well hope for a successful issue to the most serious constitutional problem with which we are faced.

The matter has been approached from various angles: (a) To leave matters as they are—the immobility of fear; (b) to reconstruct the whole Act. This is far off; but if it should ever happen, suggestions have been placed on record that it should be along the lines of the American constitution, which would rule out the rigidity of statutory interpretation and would leave room for that approach which has been developed since the time of Marshall C.J.³ and which enables the supreme court of the United States to see the national constitution ‘as an idealised picture of the social order’⁴ and ‘to approach the constitution from without and not from within’;⁵ (c) to make provision for changes in the Act as it now stands without beginning de novo.

This last approach has received strong provincial approval along the following lines. First of all, certain ‘fundamentals’

¹ House of Commons (Session 1935): Special Committee on the B.N.A. Act (Ottawa, 1935).

² I. A. Humphries, Observations on a Proposed Method of Amending the B.N.A. Act (Toronto, 1936).

³ M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat 416.

⁴ Dean Pound in 36 Harvard Law Review, at p. 641.

⁵ Frankfurter and Landis, The Business of the Supreme Court, at p. 308 (New York, 1927).

must be guarded and protected from all change apart from the unequivocal consent by the province or provinces concerned. Such are, for example, the French language, the provincial control over education, separate schools, the solemnization of marriage, the civil code and procedure in Quebec, and so on. Secondly, certain sections of the British North America Act might reasonably be changed by the parliament of Canada alone without any further process being necessary. Such are those dealing with the royal assent, &c., to federal bills; aspects of the executive power; provisions for quorums; the regulations of the speaker's voting powers; the rights and privileges of parliament, and so on. In this connexion, and by a similar legislative procedure, it ought to be possible to agree that the relationship between the senate and the house of commons might be regulated by federal statute. There remain, then, the tantalizing problems of legislative powers and certain other somewhat difficult sections of the Act.

If we assume that there is real necessity for change—and our present legal difficulties in the midst of national emergencies more than prove this necessity—we must proceed to look at matters with all the practical wisdom which we possess. We are a federation; that fact is fundamental, and must govern every approach to the subject. After examining various methods for constituent changes, modifications of those which prevail in Australia have made the widest appeal.¹ We are not unmindful of Australian failures in this connexion; but as careful research as possible has seemed to show that these are due, not to any inherent defects in the Australian methods, but to conditions which do not prevail in Canada. The most important of these modifications lies in the fact that referenda have few, if any, supporters. The weight of opinion in Canada is against any method of making a decision which would hurt the principles of cabinet government. Of course, many proposals are before the public, and some of the most important of them can be read in the report and evidence of the committee on the British North America Act. It would take me far afield were I to go into details. I should like, however, to record the proposals which, in the form of a draft bill, I laid in evidence before that committee, as a basis for discussion and fully conscious of its incomplete nature:

¹ 63 & 64 Victoria, c. 12, s. 128.

An Act in Reference to the British North America Acts

Seeing that the Parliament of Canada has passed an Address, and seeing that that Parliament has requested, under section 4 of the Statute of Westminster, that legislative effect be given to the exact terms of that address—

Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled and by the authority of the same as follows:—

1. On and after the passing of this Act the method or methods of changing the British North America Acts shall be governed by the terms of this Act.
2. The method or methods referred to in section 1 shall be as follows:

A proposal for change shall first be approved by a majority in each House of the Canadian Parliament and shall then, as thus approved, be forwarded immediately to each of the Provinces. It shall become law if approved by the legislatures of two-thirds of the Provinces within one year of their receipt thereof, provided that where the legislature of any Province takes no action within one year of the receipt of the proposal, approval thereof shall be assumed; and provided always that this method of changing, modifying, or altering the B. N. A. Acts may itself be changed, if the change itself is made in accordance with this section.

3. The Parliament of Canada shall have power, notwithstanding anything in this Act, to change the following sections of the B. N. A. Acts by simple federal legislation [here would follow non-controversial sections].
4. Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the following sections of the B. N. A. Acts [here would follow certain enumerated 'fundamentals'] shall not be changed in any respect except when the Provinces shall agree upon and/or shall ask the federal legislature to make such changes; and the federal legislature is hereby given authority to make such changes; provided that such changes, if and when made, shall themselves not be changed except upon agreement by and/or request from the Provinces.

There remain two matters which I consider essential to the workings of this draft Act, or of its basic principles. First of all, the British North America Acts should be re-enacted in Canada as part of Canadian law, and, indeed, the draft Act might include a section making this possibility clear; and secondly, all appeals to the judicial committee should be abolished—a power clearly belonging to-day to Canada and its provinces. This second proposal is of fundamental importance if our constitution is to be truly Canadian; while the first is equally fundamental if our courts are ever to be freed from the decisions already given by the judicial committee. I believe that any grant of constituent powers, apart from these two proposals, will prove not only barren, but singularly lacking in statesmanship.

iv. Merchant shipping, &c.

Canada acquires the power to repeal legislation of the United Kingdom as to merchant shipping, and the power of its parliament is widened by expressly exempting bills from the necessity of reservation when dealing with the coasting trade, and of confirmation by the crown when dealing with registered shipping.¹

¹ Cf. 57 & 58 Victoria, c. 60, ss. 735, 736.

In addition, certain sections of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, shall cease to apply.¹ The implications and width of these changes are obvious, but without technical discussion it would be impossible, as it is unsuitable, to discuss them here.

v. Interpreting the Statute of Westminster

In this concluding section, a dangerous liberty is taken—that of suggesting some thoughts, and they are nothing more, on processes of interpreting the Statute of Westminster, and they are submitted not without much of that misgiving which wise men ought to have in the presence of a legal future depending on the separate democracies of the nations in a happy condition of union under the crown. In addition, the statute has introduced into our constitutional law a certain element of legality, and we shall have in the future perhaps to do work in the law courts which we once did amid the give-and-take of discussions, correspondence, or conferences. It is not unimportant then to look into the future.

In enacting the Statute of Westminster it seemed wise to all the parliaments and governments concerned that it should be prefaced by certain recitals. These recitals, this preamble, cannot be lightly dismissed, for we may find here important guidance in interpreting the enacting clauses. The courts, indeed, may be called on to interpret the recitals themselves. I am, of course, not unmindful of the position occupied in this connexion by the preamble to a statute: it is a good means to find out its meaning, a key to its understanding; it professes generally to state the object and intention of the legislature concerned; it is legitimate for a court to consult it in attempting to solve ambiguities in the statute, or to restrain the effects of the statute within its true scope and meaning whenever there may be doubt or uncertainty; it cannot restrict or extend the enacting clauses where there is neither ambiguity nor doubt; but, where there is either and the preamble is called in aid, there may be an extension or curtailment of scope not superficially evident.

¹ Cf. 53 & 54 Victoria, c. 27, ss. 4, 7.

When we proceed to examine the statute we find certain recitals, to which we have already drawn attention, prefaced by the declaration that the delegates of all his majesty's governments had concurred in making certain declarations and resolutions at imperial conferences held in 1926 and 1930. Then follow recitals which do not seem very apposite for purposes of the statute in that, with one exception, they have no relation to the enacting clauses. Have they no function then other than that of pompous sentiment? It is submitted that they must govern the whole scheme of the statute, and they suggest a wide ambit in interpretation. The very reference in the recitals to the resolutions of the imperial conferences is itself significant; while the title, which of course is a distinct part of the statute itself, is of great importance: 'An Act to give effect to certain resolutions passed by imperial conferences held in the years 1926 and 1930.' The title and the recitals suggest a very broad approach to the process of construction.

In addition, we must recall the immediate origin of the statute. It did not originate with his majesty's government in the United Kingdom, nor was it, like the resolutions of the Quebec conference or of the Westminster conference, out of which the British North America Act arose, hammered into shape and its final form determined by the law officers and parliamentary draftsmen in the United Kingdom. It was prepared and agreed on at imperial conferences. Its form and final wording, every phrase and every line, almost its punctuation, were determined by resolutions in the parliaments of the several dominions, and in this final form, as their own, they requested and consented to its being passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom. The enactment was in essence an enactment of the dominions, to which the parliament of the United Kingdom gave the necessary force. This point of view was made fully clear in the British house of commons. The solicitor-general pointed out that the bill was not even the production of the attorney-general or of the British parliamentary draftsmen, that almost every single provision was to be found, word for word, letter for letter, in the schedule to the report of the imperial conference of 1930, and that it was the entire product of the mature consideration of that conference. He went on to say that there was no intention of 'dragooning' the house of commons into accepting the measure, and that amendments would be considered; but he added that, since the measure came in the definite form agreed on by the dominions in their legislatures and was before the parliament of the United Kingdom in that form at their specific request the government of the United Kingdom would consider it a grave responsibility to insert any amendment contrary to the expressed desire of the dominions.¹ The whole procedure was unique; and its unique nature issuing, not merely in the enacting clauses and title, but in the recitals, makes it necessary to consider the importance of the situation when interpretation is in question. In this connexion, are there to be no references to the antecedent history, to the work of the imperial conferences, to the debates in the legislatures of the dominions, to the resolutions there on which the statute was identically based, to the request for it in those identical terms from the dominions, in order to disclose its purpose and scope? These are questions of a nature important to the dominions. Are the narrow rules of statutory interpretation to lay their dead hand on the statute? The immediate origins of the statute, the consents given to it in the legislatures of the dominions, the perculiar form in which the measure was presented to the parliament of the United Kingdom, and the attitude of its government to that form combine to make the statute one of a peculiar and exceptional nature. The terms of the statute were specially 'agreed terms'. Indeed, it partakes essentially of the nature of a solemn compact between equal states—a treaty, a contract. And in order to understand it, it is submitted that the difficulties in the constitutional situations and the suggestions and discussions for their resolution as laid down in the reports of the imperial conferences, as discussed and accepted in the legislature of the dominions, form proper material for judicial reference. The statute is of such a nature that it cannot with wisdom be isolated from its sources. All this is of special importance where the enactment is vital to an entire group of nations; and the aids in interpretation ought to be made as wide and comprehensive as possible, even at the expense of the rules of statutory interpretation, which, if strictly followed, may issue perhaps in irretrievable hurt, not only to some one dominion, but by implication to all, and indeed to the whole structure of imperial unity.

¹ The solicitor-general (Sir Thomas Inskip) in the house of commons, 259 H. C. Debates, Nov. 20, 1931.

Finally, it may be asked where the ultimate interpretation of the Statute of Westminster will lie. I should like to hope that the day is not far distant when there will be created a permanent commonwealth court on the lines, ceteris paribus, of the permanent court at The Hague, and that with it will lie the interpretation of the Statute of Westminster. Doubtless such a hope is not without difficulties in realization; but they are not insurmountable in the light of the momentous issues involved. Such a court, drawn from all the British nations, with a permanent personnel, and starting ab initio with full powers to develop its own rules and jurisprudence, would not necessarily be hampered by the strict rules of statutory interpretation, and could thus bring to bear on the Statute of Westminster all the evidence possible to illustrate its meanings, to disclose its implications, and to preserve it as a living instrument of imperial government. At any rate, the burden of responsibility is heavy with destiny, and, as the statute goes forward to the challenge of interpretation, we may well remember the profound saying of Bacon—‘There is no worse torture than the torture of lawes.’

As we look back over these years certain observations may be made in conclusion. It is well to remember that all political parties in Canada have contributed to the long processes which issued in the Statute of Westminster, and the leaders of all parties now speak unequivocally of nationhood, of equality. I believe this all reflects the great middle body of Canadian opinion. But there is something more profound. I believe that we shall find in the history of these years an essential and necessary part of an evolution in which the theories and tragedy of the American revolution and of Ireland are an aspect, and of which the whole constitutional history of Canada is a part.

Baldwin, Lafontaine, and Howe, the champions of responsible government; Edward Blake, the most consummate legal advocate of full autonomy; John A. Macdonald, who saw the vision of nationhood in 1864 and grasped the clear concept of executive authority in 1879; Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the peace-maker of national sovereignty, Sir Robert Borden, and his distinguished successors—all greet the Statute of Westminster as the child of the family, begotten in our own loins and born in due course of a high lineage of Canadian statesmanship. There is, too, not an event in all this development of law and custom which did not escape fierce criticism and a baptism of dire prophecies and of ugly foretellings. But the cycles change, to leave events built into our tradition, not as fissiparous forces, or disintegrating elements, or inevitable steps to doom, but as strong foundations which guarantee the future. This progress is largely due to the fact that almost uniformly we have moved forward from a background of real concrete issues to newer constitutional conventions or legal change. Indeed, no one can read the processes of Canadian constitutional law and custom since 1763 without being convinced—amid misinterpretations within and without, amid fears and misgivings, amid lack of faith and confidence, amid obscurantism and legalism, amid loyalties falsely so called and endless constitutional genealogies barren as their protagonists—of the cumulative evidence of a beneficent providence. If we hold fast to realism, if we avoid the doctrinaire, if we maintain a wise reserve in political utterances, if we nurture the spirit of Burke and the insight of Camden, we need not fear the days ahead—Statute of Westminster, or no Statute of Westminster.

CHAPTER XXIX

CANADA IN THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

INTO the delicate and confused world of inter-commonwealth relations one enters with a certain amount of misgivings, for no one would lightly court the type of criticism which too often greets such intrusion and sometimes makes the discretion of silence the better part of constitutional or legal valour. At the risk, however, of being misinterpreted or perhaps abused, I think it necessary to conclude this treatise with some short statement on the subject; and it is written with no legal, constitutional, or political axe to grind, and certainly, I hope, in no spirit of partisanship.

First of all, it is abundantly clear that in the league of nations and its institutions Canada holds an international place of distinct sovereignty. Whether its connexion with these international activities is wise or foolish is not here under discussion, or whether Canada has carried out to the full the obligations arising from them is for the moment immaterial; the fact remains that within the league scheme Canada owns a separate international personality.¹ Secondly, Canada possesses in inter-imperial law all the sovereignty necessary for the vast balance of its affairs. In the executive, legislative, and judicial spheres this sovereignty enjoys a practical completeness. Thirdly, this practical completeness is not absolute, in that, in the final test of sovereignty—that of war—Canada is not a sovereign state. The relationship between Canada and the United Kingdom is not in law that of a personal union; and it remains as true in 1937 as it did in 1914 that when the crown is at war, Canada is legally at war.

¹ Cf. A. B. Keith, Speeches and Documents on the British Dominions, 1918-1931, p. xxxvii (Oxford, 1931).

It is also as true to-day as it was in 1914 that Canada is under no legal obligations to take an active part in any war in which the law makes it a legal participant. All political parties in Canada must agree that active participation depends on action in Canada; and it is a mere political platitude to state that any such action depends on the Canadian parliament. It is well to emphasize this obvious fact, which, apart from statutes still in force, is the obvious outcome of the simple truth that war depends on finance and finance depends on the legislature. It is also well to remember that 'passive' belligerency does nothing in law to solve, vis-à-vis the enemy, the implications of de jure belligerency.

On the other hand, it is not so obvious how far a parliament elected on other and infinitely lesser issues should exercise its undoubted legal rights in this connexion. Doubtless much political, if not indeed social, obloquy fell on Mr. Arthur Meighen when he once suggested that the question of participation in a war should be the subject-matter of a general election; but it may well be that this position may ultimately constitute the rule asked for by the Canadian electorate, for evidence is not wanting that there is growing up a dissatisfaction with the ancient formula. This dissatisfaction takes the form of a strict interpretation of the conception of 'the political mandate'. That parliament should make this most tremendous of all national decisions, vote millions of dollars, burden the nation with the weight of a heavy debt, possibly hand on a tragic legacy of internal strife, perhaps prolong its own legal term of office, offer to its decisions thousands of Canadian lives—all this is not so clear to-day as it once was and is certainly not of general acceptance; while all the time the very issues with which parliament has dealt were utterly unknown when it was elected, and its very dealings with them may have robbed it of any popular support which it may once have possessed. At any rate, this is a matter for decision, for parliament alone possesses power to control Canadian action when Canada becomes in a state of war owing to action by the crown.

Canada might indeed attempt to do what South Africa has done, and try to find perhaps a legal loophole to remain technically neutral while preserving the allegiance.¹ Such action, however, would raise serious problems, even if we argue that the South African legislation can legally function. What would be the position in Canada in case of such neutrality? Canada would have to face a situation, if it desired respect for its neutrality on the part of a state or states at war with the crown, in which it must be prepared to deal properly with British nationals other than Canadian, resident in Canada, with war-material, with its ports and territorial waters. In a word, Canada would be compelled to face each and every international implication of neutrality; and they are to-day such as, if accepted, would virtually constitute a declaration of independence. The only solution, as the law now stands, which would effectively establish a legal place for Canadian neutrality would be the dissolution—for a moment in time at least—of the present unity of the crown, with due notice to the world, and then the setting up of a new unity, on the analogy of the personal union between the United Kingdom and Hanover—a position which clearly does not exist in law to-day. There is, of course, the solution offered by secession, fraught though it would undoubtedly be with civil war; but secession is for Canada at present legally impossible although, as has been pointed out earlier in this treatise,² no efforts would be made by Great Britain to maintain Canada in the empire against its will.

The maze of problems and the issues involved are not rendered

¹ Cf. W. P. M. Kennedy and H. J. Schlosberg, The Law and Custom of the South African Constitution, at pp. 614 ff. (Oxford, 1935), A. B. Keith, 'The Status of the Union of South Africa' in 46 Juridical Review, at pp. 155 ff., W. P. M. Kennedy, 'Status of South Africa' in 1 University of Toronto Law Journal, at pp. 147 ff., A. B. Keith, 'The Royal Executive Functions and Seals Act' in 16 Journal of Comparative Legislation (1934), at p. 291.

² Supra, p. 448.

any easier of appreciation, to say nothing of solution, by the woful neglect of foreign policy in parliament. It may be that the air would be somewhat cleared were the ministry of external affairs held as a separate office, if the permanent personnel of a much overworked department were increased and strengthened, and if foreign affairs became a part of deliberate and regular parliamentary discussion, for the electorate is confused and ignorant. Indeed, from the purely selfish point of view, such changes ought to recommend themselves to any government in power, for they would be of great assistance to it when the day came for parliament to make a decision, or for the electorate, on a dissolution, to resolve the issues.

Beyond all this it is unwise, perhaps fruitless, to go. Canada is not only a federation but an exceedingly delicately balanced one; and it is well, in the tremendous world in which we live, to remember with something of the practical wisdom so dear to the Greeks, that this delicate situation exists, that foreign policy is ultimately a projection of domestic policy, that the final awful decision of war is not a fit subject for division on purely party lines, and that there is wide room for differences of opinion without such question-begging epithets as 'disloyalty' or 'traitor'. Peace is undoubtedly the hope of the world, and Canada has made, and can make, many contributions to it by precept and example; aggression is completely outside Canadian aims and purposes. However, in an armed world, with European civilization perhaps in the process of disintegration, with the institutional structure for the promotion of peace perhaps rocking to its doom, with awesome rumblings of vast volcanic significance from the far east—we may well take heed. It is well to know with clarity the legal situation, to appreciate Canadian nationhood in its legal meanings, and to understand not only the width but the narrowness of our equality. And, as the law now stands, it is idle to believe that, under the Balfour formula, Canada is 'in no way subordinate' in any aspect of its external affairs. Indeed, the blessed Balfourian phrase is at the best a pious wish, at the worst an anodyne; while it is too often forgotten that it is effectively qualified by the legal truth: 'united by a common allegiance to the crown.' It is not unworthy of Canada to remember the source of much of its municipal, imperial, and international status, and to recall the grim meaning which Canadians a few short years ago wrote into the concept of Canadian nationhood. One thing is certain, if obvious—the legal implications of Canada's place in the British commonwealth are strictly Canadian, in that they rest on Canadian public opinion; while changes may come, if desired, solely and exclusively through Canadian action. Beyond that all is vanity and vexation of spirit. It is then not entirely unwise to conclude this treatise with the frank statement that the path trod by angels with fear is not lightly to be begun by mortal men. The ways of a democracy are past finding out; and doubtless Solomon would have accepted them—with those of an eagle in the air, of a serpent upon a rock, of a ship in the midst of the sea, of a man with a maid—as too wonderful even for his knowledge. Among them is a peculiar capacity to resent unsolicited external advice, however well-intentioned and friendly may be the source. For better or worse, and outside the understanding even of wise men—Canada is a democracy.

APPENDIX I

THE CANADIAN 'NEW DEAL'

THE administration of Mr. R. B. Bennett was responsible for a scheme of legislation, arising out of economic and pressing social conditions, and commonly known as the Canadian 'New Deal'. On the advent to power of the liberal party this legislation was referred to the supreme court by the governor-general in council,¹ and later the judgements of that court were considered by the judicial committee of the privy council. In keeping with the general purposes of this treatise, no attempt will be made to examine the judicial history in detail or to annotate the cases in a technical manner. My aims will best be served by stating in a somewhat cursory and categorical manner the problems, by reference to the light, if any, thrown on the processes of constitutional interpretation, and by drawing attention to some serious issues.

The supreme court of Canada affirmed (Duff C. J., Rinfret, Davis, Kerwin JJ., with Cannon and Crocket JJ. dissenting) the power of the dominion to enact that certain trade practices leading to unfair competition should be criminal offences. The judicial committee affirmed this judgement as they saw no evidence that the federal legislature was using its exclusive authority over criminal law as a pretext for invading provincial legislative powers. This possibility of invasion constitutes the only limitation on the plenary power of Canada to determine what should or what should not be criminal.²

The supreme court decided unanimously that the federal legislature cannot establish a marketing board whose powers

¹ Supra, p. 395.

² Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1937] A. C. 368; on appeal from [1936] S. C. R. 363.

include authority to control when and where and under what agents natural products, to which an approved scheme related, should be marketed, and to decide the manner of distribution, the qualities, &c., of the products. The judicial committee affirmed this judgement and pointed out that the federal power to regulate commerce and trade excluded the power to deal with intra-provincial trade. The legislation was so complex that it was impossible to save the criminal sections which dealt with inter-provincial and foreign trade.¹

The supreme court decided (with Cannon, J., dissenting) that legislation was intra vires by which a farmer might make with his creditors a proposal for a composition, extension of time, or scheme of arrangement. If it is approved by the creditors and the court it takes effect; but, if it is not accepted by the creditors, the question is referred to the board of review for purposes of formulating a proposal. If this is accepted by the creditors, or, after rejection, is confirmed by the board, it is binding on both debtor and creditors. The judicial committee affirmed this judgement, since the legislation genuinely related to the federal power over bankruptcy and insolvency.²

The supreme court was equally divided in dealing with the constitutionality of the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, the Limitations of Hours of Work Act, and the Minimum Wages Act, which professed to give effect to the draft conventions adopted by the International Labour Organization of the League of Nations and ratified by the dominion. Duff C. J., Davis and Kerwin JJ., supported the legislation, relying on the processes of constitutional developments and on the presumed authority of the *Aviation Case*³ and the Radio Case.⁴ Those judges, who considered the statutes ultra vires,

¹ Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1937] A. C. 377; on appeal from [1936] S. C. R. 398.

² Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1937] A. C. 391; on appeal from [1936] S. C. R. 384.

³ [1932] A. C. 54.

⁴ [1932] A. C. 304.

arrived at their conclusions by various processes, but the judgement of Rinfret J. sufficiently reflects them: the legislation cannot be supported as emergency legislation; the Treaty of Versailles imposes no obligations on the dominion to legislate in accordance with the conventions, but only to bring them before the competent authority, dominion or provincial, a position binding on the supreme court by a previous decision,¹ unless contrary to the Aviation Case or the Radio Case; the conventions are not treaties within the meaning of section 132 (the treaty section) of the British North America Act, especially as the term was understood in 1867, and the Aviation Case and the Radio Case, while in both there was a treaty or something which 'came to the same thing', yet the subject-matters were held to come within federal legislative powers. The judicial committee decided that the three statutes were ultra vires the parliament of Canada as legislation relating to matters of property and civil rights within the provinces. In addition, the legislation could not be justified and upheld under section 132 of the British North America Act. This section provides that 'The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any Province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries, arising under treaties between the Empire and such foreign countries'. The obligations, under the conventions ratified by Canada, were 'not obligations of Canada as part of the British Empire, but of Canada, by virtue of her new status as an international person and do not arise under a treaty between the British Empire and foreign countries'. If a treaty requires legislative sanction, the dominion can only give that sanction within the scope of its legislative capacity, and the enlarged executive functions of Canada flowing from its international status did not increase its legislative subject-matters. Canada possessed through the totality of dominion and provincial legislative powers, full legislative capacity to satisfy the performance of treaty obligations, but this capacity is distributed; and if Canada, in its new status, exercised its functions to incur international obligations, they must, where legislation is concerned, when they dealt with provincial subject-matters, be dealt with through a co-operative use of the totality of powers.¹

¹ In re Legislative Jurisdiction over Hours of Labour, [1925] S. C. R. 505.

The supreme court decided by a majority (Rinfret, Cannon, Crocket, Kerwin JJ., with Duff C. J. and Davis J. dissenting) that the legislation providing for unemployment and social insurance was ultra vires, since the system proposed was in reality and substance one of insurance, the legislation was not in truth emergency legislation, and the dominion could not under the pretext and colour of taxation invade provincial powers. The minority upheld the legislation as flowing from an amalgamation of powers over public property and taxation. The dominion raised the funds which became public property which the dominion could dispose of as it pleased. The judicial committee affirmed the judgement of the supreme court. The legislation was in pith and substance insurance legislation affecting the civil rights of employees and employers in the provinces, and accordingly legislation dealing with provincial subjects. As for the taxing power, Lord Atkin, delivering the judgement, said:

It only remains to deal with the argument which found favour with the Chief Justice and Davis, J., that the legislation can be supported under the enumerated heads, 1 and 3 of s. 91 of the British North American Act, 1867: (1) the public debt and property, namely (3) the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation. Shortly stated, the argument is that the obligation . . . is a mode of taxation: that the money so raised becomes public property and that the Dominion have then complete legislative authority to direct that the money so raised . . . shall be applied in forming an insurance fund. . . . That the dominion may impose taxation for the purpose of creating a fund for special purposes, and may apply that fund for making contributions in the public interest to individuals [&c.] could not as a general proposition be denied. Whether in such an Act as the present compulsion applied to an employed person to make a contribution to an insurance fund . . . is in fact taxation it is not necessary finally to decide . . . but assuming that the Dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within Dominion competence. It may still be legislation affecting the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92, and, if so, would be ultra vires. In other words, Dominion legislation, even though it deals with Dominion property, may yet be so framed as to invade civil rights within the Province, or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to Provincial competence. It is not necessary that it should be a colourable device, or a pretence. If on the true view of the legislation it is found that in reality in pith and substance the legislation invades civil rights within the Province, or in respect of other classes of subjects otherwise encroaches upon the provincial field, the legislation will be invalid. To hold otherwise would afford the Dominion an easy passage into the Provincial domain.¹

¹ Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1937] A. C. 326; on appeal from [1936] S. C. R. 461.

The supreme court decided unanimously that, neither as incidental to criminal law nor as a matter of trade and commerce, was the legislation ultra vires which provided that agreements between persons in any specific industry to modify unjust competition may be approved by the governor-general in council and should then take effect, and that the words 'Canada Standard' could be used as a national trade-mark. The words are not in truth a trade-mark. The judicial committee varied the judgement to uphold the validity of the sections dealing with the words 'Canada Standard'.¹

¹ Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1937] A. C. 355; appeal from [1936] S. C. R. 427.

Reference has already been made to the intentions of the 'fathers' of federation, and they are written clearly in the literature of the period; and it has been pointed out, on the other hand, that the judicial committee have sought these intentions within the British North America Act itself, expounding it according to its terms precisely as framed and clear of any qualifications or intentions which are not expressed.² Indeed, after a careful examination of every case in every jurisdiction dealing with the interpretation of the Act, I venture to submit that in not one of them has the ratio decidendi depended on reasons external to the Act. 'Intentions' of 'fathers' are one thing, but it is quite another thing to make intentions and statute accord. So generally uniform has been the approach of the judicial committee that, on the basis of it, I anticipated almost all these judgements, except that on unemployment insurance, before their subject-matters were referred to the supreme court, and thence to London.³

And here I should like to refer to one point which has caused some misunderstanding. It has been said: 'Why criticize the judicial committee in relation to the "new deal", when in fact it practically did what the supreme court did? How much further advanced would we be, had the supreme court the final say?' The answer to these questions is clear. The supreme court is bound by the judgements of the privy council, and it must profess to follow them to the best of its ability. The generality of judicial methods observed by the judicial committee almost made the decisions of the supreme court inevitable; and they stand as further evidence of the necessity, when the day of constituent powers comes, of freeing the supreme court of the burden of precedents at present binding on them.¹

¹ Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1937] A. C. 405; on appeal from [1936] S. C. R. 379.

² Supra, pp. 488 ff.

³ 48 Juridical Review (1936), at pp. 57 ff.

It would defeat my purposes to examine technically all these judgements, which gave rise to a learned debate in the house of commons in which the Hon. C. H. Cahan delivered one of the most brilliant and effective critical speeches of his career.² Speaking as a constitutional lawyer, he pointed to certain matters of importance. (1) The judicial committee had misquoted the Act and spoken of legislation as 'affecting' subject-matters, whereas the Act uses the words 'in relation to' subject-matters. Legislation may 'affect' subject-matters without being legislation 'in relation to' them. (2) Lord Atkin's opinion (already quoted) on the federal taxing-power raises grave doubt about the legality of many federal appropriations. Here I should like to say with respect, that I cannot understand the meaning of Lord Atkin's words. Mr. Cahan may see in them one thing, I venture to see another. Is there some new rule? May federal legislation of a taxing-nature be declared invalid because in pith and substance it invades provincial civil, property, or other rights? We have been taught for generations by the judicial committee itself that there are no implied prohibitions in the British North America Act, that the courts are not concerned with the abuse of a clearly granted power.³ All this is a legal commonplace. If the federal taxing-power is clear (and it cannot be stated in any clearer terms), if it is to prevail 'notwithstanding anything in the Act', then, what is the principle of judicial direction in Lord Atkin's words? (3) The whole process of interpreting section 132 is most confusing in that Canada's international status is set over against its position as part of the British

¹ Cf. supra, p. 533.

² House of Commons Debates (April 5, 1937), pp. 2773 ff. For a detailed survey of the judgements, see The Canadian Bar Review, June 1937. The Government of Canada has issued (Ottawa, 1937) the judgements in convenient pamphlets which include the judgement of the supreme court.

³ Cf. supra, p. 428.

Empire; the executive function is looked on from an antiquarian point of view, as, apparently, something called an 'imperial executive' may, by treaty, impose obligations on Canada; the judicial committee have decided a point which was not before them; there is a strange incongruity in relation to section 132 in deciding that Canada can carry into full effect a treaty negotiated and ratified in the name of his majesty on the advice of the privy council of the United Kingdom, while no such authority exists if the treaty is ratified and negotiated on the advice of the Canadian privy council. For myself I never believed that the treaty-power could be used substantially 'in relation to' provincial matters, but could be used legally to 'affect' them. It would have been a great help had their lordships realized that there is no such thing in law as 'treaties between the Empire and . . . foreign countries' (pace the B.N.A. Act, 'Empire treaties' is not a term of art), and that, apart from extra-legal and conventional procedure, treaties are made in law to-day, in relation to Canada, as they would have been made in 1867. The Act is now hopelessly confused, and the treaty-making power is magnificently obscured and gloriously obfuscated.

The judgements make it clear that the hope which some citizens drew from the *Edwards Case*¹ that the judicial committee might be disposed to treat the Act as a 'constitution', are vain, in spite of the unqualified use which Lord Sankey made of that conception in a later case.² The truth is that the concept was not necessary to this later judgement; and, at any rate, the judgements under consideration make it abundantly clear that the judicial committee is determined to abide by the general approach of statutory interpretation, whatever the problems may be which arise out of this process of judicial self-limitation. This being so, it is impossible to hope for, or indeed to expect, a true 'constitutional' approach; and I submit that the real position is that stated in 1937 by McGillivray J. A., in a learned judgement applying to all our courts, the supreme court included: 'It seems to me that none of the observations of Viscount Sankey can be said to provide legal justification for an attempt by Canadian courts to mould and fashion the Canadian constitution so as to make it conform according to their views to the requirements of present-day social and economic conditions.'¹

¹ Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A. C. 124. Cf. supra, pp. 493 ff.

² British Coal Corporation v. The King, (1935) 51 T. L. R. 508; [1935] A. C. 500, at p. 518.

A word may be added in connexion with the so-called general federal power to legislate for 'the peace, order, and good government of Canada'. This power is now further entrenched as one only available to the dominion in an emergency. It may be said to have achieved the dignity of permanence as 'the Haldane amendment'.² In addition, it would also appear that the hope which I ventured to draw from the *P.A.T.A. Case*³ for the giving of a substantial content to the federal power in relation to 'the regulation of trade and commerce' will not be realized.⁴ And so (i) the British North America Act is a statute, and not a 'constitution'; (ii) analogies must not be drawn from the processes of constitutional interpretation in the United States, where, whatever the present distresses, the supreme court, owing to the form of the constitution, have been able to give to the most rigid of instruments of government a remarkable elasticity; (iii) the judicial committee has no intention whatever in any grave or substantial manner of rewriting the Act. In spite of the fact that technically it is not bound by its previous decisions, yet the weight of methods of interpretation of decisions

¹ Kazakewich v. Kazakewich, [1937] 1 D. L. R. 548, at p. 567 (Alberta).

² Cf. supra, p. 491.

³ [1931] 2 D. L. R. 1, at pp. 11-12; [1931] A. C. 310, at p. 326. See supra, pp. 492-3.

⁴ It may be that the 'trade and commerce' power was broadened by the judicial committee in relation to the use of the words 'Canada Standard'.

on the British North America Act is too heavy to be cast aside, even though it may grievously beset Canada.

The judicial committee has placed before Canada the solution of a great problem, and it is one inherent in federalism—to change the constitution. This is a matter which I have already discussed¹; but I should like to conclude with some thoughts in this connexion suggested by these judgements. For Canada, constitutional changes seem peculiarly difficult, as Canadian federalism is not merely that of a political union, but is one based on race, religion, geography, economics. No constituent powers, however completely Canadian, can abolish the possibilities of friction. Federalism is a second best, and in Canada it must remain a second second best. The insistent question which worries me is—not the institutional expression of constituent powers—but whether Canada as yet possesses the ultimate concept of nationhood. For there, in truth, is the issue: Am I a Canadian? The answer, if ‘yes’, does not destroy provincial powers, it integrates them in a political entity. The answer, if ‘no’, leaves the entire problem unsolved. We must decide whether a common purpose exists which is greater than mere locality. If we cannot adjust nationhood and locality, it makes no difference what form the constitution may take—our loyalties have never given birth to the larger loyalty. It may be that our slow and almost timorous approach to the problems of constituent powers is due to the lack of political growth or to the fact that our nationhood is largely a geographical expression and not a social and human thing—a name on a map, not a society. In the far-off days of 1864–7 the men who made the dominion deliberately looked forward to a time when its citizens would forget that they were upper or lower Canadians, Nova Scotians, New Brunswickers and so on, and would become Canadians. The problems of the British North America Act and of its interpretation would seem to await solution in the realization of that vision.

¹ Supra, pp. 528 ff.

APPENDIX II

THE ABDICATION OF EDWARD VIII: THE CORONATION OF GEORGE VI

FOR a considerable time before he came to the throne and after his accession King Edward VIII had maintained a friendship, publicly and without any effort aiming at secrecy, with Mrs. Ernest Simpson, an American lady by birth, who was a British subject owing to her second marriage, which had taken place after she had divorced her first husband in the United States, who was still living. This friendship had given rise to a variety of facts and fictions in the foreign press, especially during the late summer and autumn of 1936; and these reports had been read in Canada owing to the wide and usual circulation of American newspapers there. The press throughout the empire remained practically silent, and the journalistic farrago was almost unread elsewhere by its citizens. We may note, however, that Mr. Mackenzie King was in the United Kingdom on a private visit from October 16 to October 31; and it is reasonable to suggest, in the light of events, that, owing to the concern in Canada, he at least referred to the matter in his interview with the prime minister of the United Kingdom.¹ However that may be, we must accept as official the latter's reference to November 27 as the date of his first formal contact with the prime ministers of the dominions. On October 18 he requested a secret interview with the king on a matter of urgency, and this took place two days later at Fort Belvedere, and was apparently of a more or less informal nature, as Mr. Baldwin (as he then was), having informed neither his colleagues nor the governments of the dominions, spoke only in a personal capacity, although it is obvious that the interview itself arose from the office which he held. Speaking unequivocally and without reserve, he did not press for any answer, but he made clear his concern over criticism of the monarchy especially during the period of suspense which would follow if Mrs. Simpson were granted a decree nisi in the petition which she had already lodged for divorce set down from trial at the Ipswich assizes and granted in an undefended action a week later. The king stated that he desired the matter to be settled by himself and the prime minister without any other interference; and he expressed a wish for quick action. The prime minister reported the interview to some of his senior colleagues, but no communication, either by the king or the prime minister, appears to have taken place with the dominions. On November 16 the king requested a second interview, which took place at Buckingham Palace, where the prime minister spoke first—emphatically but with formal reservations. He pointed out that in public affairs the king must obey the people's voice, that the person of the queen was such an affair, that therefore the king must obey this voice in choosing her, and that, as the people would not approve of Mrs. Simpson as queen, the king must not contract such a marriage. To all this the king replied 'I am going to marry Mrs. Simpson and I am prepared to go.' On November 25 the king again sent for Mr. Baldwin and requested information on the possibility of legislation covering a morganatic marriage. The prime minister refused any formal reply; but, in reply to further questions from the king, he stated that his own informal opinion was that the parliament of the United Kingdom would never pass such a measure. In addition, he informed the king that no formal answer could be made without full cabinet consultation and without communications with the prime ministers of the dominions. Such formal examination was requested by the king. On November 27 Mr. Baldwin informed the prime ministers of the dominions, giving an account of the various interviews, and presenting the three possibilities as he saw them: (i) a normal marriage, (ii) a morganatic marriage, (iii) abdication. He requested not only their personal opinions but in some degree an estimate of the views of their peoples. It would appear that the request was informal and confidential. On the same day the cabinet of the United Kingdom made a formal decision against a morganatic marriage. Within a few days replies were received by Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Mackenzie King's stating that the people of Canada would not approve of the marriage to Mrs. Simpson, whether she became queen or not. There appears to have been no cabinet consultation and such indeed was not demanded by the form of Mr. Baldwin's communication. On December 2 the king again called Mr. Baldwin to an interview and asked for an answer to his question. The prime minister replied that his inquiries were not complete (a reply proper in the circumstances, because no official action had been taken in the dominions), but that they were sufficient to show that the legislation contemplated by the king would not be forthcoming in any of the legislatures concerned. Thus, as the king and Mr. Baldwin understood the matter, the question of a morganatic marriage was closed, and consideration was directed to possibilities of complete abandonment of the marriage or abdication. At this point further privacy was impossible, as two English newspapers, urged to action apparently by some unctuous remarks by the Bishop of Bradford in another connexion, announced the king's desire to marry Mrs. Simpson. The newspapers of the empire followed suit, and a week of anxiety followed, during which Mr. Baldwin suggested that the cabinets of the dominions might wish to give the king direct advice, and such was forthcoming, that from Canada on December 8. The king was formally asked to retain the throne, but the advice assumed, or indeed stated, that such retention was incompatible with a marriage to Mrs. Simpson. Abdication was preferred to any kind of a marriage with her. -

¹ From this point, facts have been drawn from the speech delivered by the prime minister of the United Kingdom in the house of commons on December 10, 1936 (318 House of Commons Debates, 2186-2196). This constitutes the clearest record. Small points, more or less official, can be gleaned from the debates in the parliament of Canada and in those of the other dominions; but they add little or nothing. The accounts in the newspapers and journals are pure gossip in so far as they deviate from these records.

On December 10 the king executed an 'instrument of abdication' addressed to no one in particular, and in a message to the house of commons he further expressed his wishes. This message, which included the 'instrument', duly sent to the dominions and later considered by the parliament of Canada,¹ is as follows:

After long and anxious consideration, I have determined to renounce the throne to which I succeeded on the death of my father, and I am now communicating this, my final and irrevocable decision. Realizing as I do the gravity of this step, I can only hope that I shall have the understanding of my peoples in the decision I have taken and the reasons which have led me to take it. I will not enter now into my private feelings, but I would beg that it should be remembered that the burden which constantly rests upon the shoulders of a sovereign is so heavy that it can only be borne in circumstances different from those in which I now find myself. I conceive that I am not overlooking the duty that rests on me to place in the forefront the public interest, when I declare that I am conscious that I can no longer discharge this heavy task with efficiency or with satisfaction to myself.

I have accordingly this morning executed an instrument of abdication in the terms following:

'I Edward VIII, of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Emperor of India, do hereby declare my irrevocable determination to renounce the throne for myself and for my descendants, and my desire that effect should be given to this instrument of abdication immediately.

In token whereof I have hereunto set my hand, this tenth day of December, nineteen hundred and thirty-six, in the presence of the witnesses whose signatures are subscribed.

¹ From this point the Canadian events are drawn from House of Commons Debates, January 14, 1937, and following days.

(Signed) Edward R.I.'

My execution of this instrument has been witnessed by my three brothers, their Royal Highnesses the Duke of York, the Duke of Gloucester, and the Duke of Kent.

I deeply appreciate the spirit which has actuated the appeals which have been made to me to take a different decision, and I have, before reaching my final determination, most fully pondered over them. But my mind is made up. Moreover, further delay cannot but be most injurious to the peoples whom I have tried to serve as Prince of Wales and as King and whose future happiness and prosperity are the constant wish of my heart.

I take my leave of them in the confident hope that the course which I have thought it right to follow is that which is best for the stability of the throne and empire and the happiness of my peoples. I am deeply sensible of the consideration which they have always extended to me both before and after my accession to the throne and which I know they will extend in full measure to my successor.

I am most anxious that there should be no delay of any kind in giving effect to the instrument which I have executed and that all necessary steps should be taken immediately to secure that my lawful successor, my brother, His Royal Highness the Duke of York, should ascend the throne.

10th December, 1936.

Edward R.I.

The message was duly considered. At 6.40 p.m. His Majesty's Declaration of Abdication Bill was brought in and given a first reading in the house of commons of the United Kingdom, and on the same day the privy council of Canada passed an order in council expressing the request and consent of Canada to the bill, which went through all its stages and duly received the royal assent by royal commission at 1.52. p.m., on December 11 in the following form:

An Act to give effect to His Majesty's declaration of abdication; and for purposes connected therewith.

WHEREAS His Majesty by His Royal Message of the tenth day of December in this present year has been pleased to declare that He is irrevocably determined to renounce the throne for Himself and His descendants, and has for that purpose executed the Instrument of Abdication set out in the Schedule to this Act, and has signified His desire that effect thereto should be given immediately.

AND WHEREAS, following upon the communication to His Dominions of His Majesty's said declaration and desire, the Dominion of Canada pursuant to the provisions of section four of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, has requested and consented to the enactment of this Act, and the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa have assented thereto.

BE IT THEREFORE enacted by the King's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Effect of His Majesty's declaration of abdication

1. (1) Immediately upon the Royal Assent being signified to this Act the Instrument of Abdication executed by His present majesty on the tenth day of December, nineteen hundred and thirty-six, set out in the Schedule to this Act, shall have effect, and thereupon His Majesty shall cease to be King and there shall be a demise of the crown, and accordingly the next member of the Royal Family then next in succession to the Throne shall succeed thereto and to all the rights, privileges, and dignities thereunto belonging.

(2) His Majesty, His issue, if any, and the descendants of that issue, shall not after His Majesty's abdication have any right title or interest in or to the succession to the Throne and section one of the Act of Settlement shall be construed accordingly.

(3) The Royal Marriages Act, 1772, shall not apply to His Majesty after His abdication nor to the issue, if any, of His Majesty or the descendants of that issue.

2. This Act may be cited as His Majesty's Declaration of ^{Short} Abdication Act, 1936. ^{title}

[Here follows the Schedule of the Instrument of Abdication.]

On December 12, George VI was proclaimed throughout the Empire.

During the details of the episode, King Edward seems to have kept strictly within the law and conventions, and he disclosed as high a conception, in laying down his office as in his retention of it, of the constitutional foundations on which it rests. It is tragic to lose a king under the circumstances; it is magnificent that, in the issues, he was truly a British monarch. The meticulous picker-up of constitutional crumbs may find details which may not square with constitutional pedantry; for the general history, the king's actions stand clear and right. However all this may be, he bade farewell to his former subjects in a broadcast speech of great dignity, of controlled emotion, of human simplicity, which will live in history, be read round our British firesides and be recited in schools long after the constitutional crises will have declined in intensity proportionate as the few weeks of its endurance will be to the centuries of our lasting.

It would be of interest to examine the issues in the other dominions, but this has been done in an exemplary manner by Mr. R. T. E. Latham of All Souls College, Oxford, and it is unnecessary to reproduce his work.¹ As for Canada, the debates in the senate and house of commons disclose that the government took care, with abundance of caution, to satisfy every conceivable jot and tittle of law and convention. It would fulfil no useful purpose to examine in this treatise the minutiae of legal arguments or the refinements of juristic concepts. Personally I believe that Canadian action erred on the side of supererogation; but all the criticisms can be read and digested at leisure which were made during the discussions in the federal legislature in January 1937, when the actions of the cabinet in December were ratified and legislatism passed in the following form:

¹ I should like to take this opportunity to draw special attention to Mr. Latham's 'The Law and the Commonwealth' which forms pp. 510-630 of Professor W. K. Hancock's excellent Survey of British Commonwealth Affairs (Oxford, 1937). Mr. Latham's discussion is liable to be overlooked. This would be unfortunate, as it discloses the emergence of a new constitutional lawyer of exceptional brilliance.

An Act respecting alteration in the law touching the Succession to the Throne.

Preamble

WHEREAS His former Majesty, King Edward VIII, by His Royal Message of the tenth day of December, in the year of Our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-six, was pleased to declare that He was irrevocably determined to renounce the Throne for Himself and His descendants, and that He had for that purpose executed the Instrument of Abdication, which is set out in Schedule One to this Act, and signified His desire that effect thereto should be given immediately.

AND WHEREAS, following upon communications to His Majesty's Government in Canada of His former Majesty's said declaration and desire, the request and consent of Canada, pursuant to the provisions of section four of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, to the enactment of His Majesty's Declaration of Abdication Act 1936, which is set out in Schedule Two to this Act, was communicated to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom:

AND WHEREAS the following recital is set forth in the preamble to the Statute of Westminster, 1931:

Statute of Westminster,
U.K. 22
Geo. V,
Ch. 4

And whereas it is meet and proper to set out by way of preamble to this Act that, inasmuch as the Crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and as they are united by a common allegiance to the Crown, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the Commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the succession to the Throne or the Royal Style and Titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the Parliaments of all the Dominions as of the Parliament of the United Kingdom’; and accordingly it became necessary to declare the Assent of the Parliament of Canada to the alteration in the law touching the succession to the Throne set forth in His Majesty’s Declaration of Abdication Act, 1936.

Now, therefore, His Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada enacts as follows:

1. The alteration in the law touching the succession to the Throne set forth in the Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom intituled ‘His Majesty’s Declaration of Abdication Act, 1936’ is hereby assented to.

Assent to the alteration in the law touching the succession to the Throne.

[Here follow Schedules One and Two containing respectively the Instrument of Abdication and the Abdication Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.]

For those to whom autonomy and nationhood mean much, the enacting clause of this statute stands amid ‘God’s plenty’ of legal support, if not of legal verbiage; for ‘imperialists’ and ‘colonials’ there can be the consolation that perhaps it is all largely idle and without legal significance. Meanwhile we go on with our work. It is however, impossible to leave this history without recognizing that it is a matter for national congratulation that Mr. Mackenzie King dealt with the episode in a singularly statesmanlike manner—wise in action, in expression, in judgement. In Canada, there was danger of emotional unbalance owing to the peculiar newspaper situation. Never once did this take place; and this fact is largely due to the leadership and example of the prime minister, who, however he may have dealt with the law and custom, preserved the dignity of our traditions and the self-respect of our sorrow.

On May 12, 1937, George VI was crowned amid traditional pomp and splendour. For our purposes there are two points of interest. A Canadian standard was borne into Westminster Abbey: an adaptation of the arms of Canada granted by royal proclamation in 1921, with the royal crown on the staff, but no Union Jack.¹ Obscure in its genealogy, it doubtless bore witness to the pomp of power without perhaps satisfying the boast of heraldry. Secondly, and much more important, a new oath was provided in the following form:

Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the peoples of Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, of your Possessions and the Territories to any of them belonging or pertaining, and of your Empire of India, according to their respective laws and customs?

I solemnly promise so to do.

This oath took the place of that provided by older legislation:

Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Dominions thereto belonging, according to the Statutes in Parliament agreed on, and the respective laws and customs of the same?

I solemnly promise so to do.²

It is obvious, whatever its legal authority or origin, that the ¹ Canada does not possess a recognized distinctive national flag. The red ensign, with the arms of Canada in the fly is used on vessels of the Canadian mercantile marine. By order in council of January 26, 1924, authority was given for the flying of the red ensign, with arms of Canada in the fly, on suitable occasions from all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situated outside Canada, such as the High Commissioner's office in London and the Canadian legations abroad.

² 1 Will. and Mary C. 6. Cf. C. G. Robertson, Select Statutes, at p. 118 (London, 1919).

new oath is a necessary outcome of the distinct legal personalities of the dominions, which in no sense whatever 'belong to' the United Kingdom. It is, too, a singular witness to the practical soundness of the arguments of the theorists of the American revolution.¹ It is interesting to record, in this connexion, that Canada, conscious of the inappropriateness of the term 'belonging to', had already eliminated it from the oath of allegiance which holders of public office take in Canada.²

Finally, we may point out that there is nothing in this new oath to constitute his Majesty 'King of Canada' in any sense that the crown has ceased to be one, or that the relationship between Canada and the United Kingdom is that of a personal union. George VI is, of course, 'King of Canada' in the sense that he is king of all his dominions and of each parish or township thereof, as was his brother, his father, and so on. He is not 'King of Canada' in the sense that he wears a separate Canadian crown; and the term, if used, is purely colloquial and has no legal meaning or existence. No changes in a coronation ceremony could destroy the legal unity of the crown. To believe otherwise would be to believe in a constitutional monstrosity.

It may be unwise to conclude this history on a note of warning. On the other hand, it is not entirely idle to point out that there is a law of diminishing returns in the rhetorical expressions of loyalty to the crown as the 'sole remaining link of empire' which have flowed in swollen streams since December 10, 1936. We were fortunate indeed that the unity survived the unparalleled events; but there might easily have been situations where the crown might have proved anything but a unifying force. It is well to realize in Canada and elsewhere, where there are similar traditions, that in other parts of the empire the crown may not, and perhaps cannot, have the same sentimental appeal, and that the expression of this sentiment of unity through the crown ought to be restrained, modest, and free from strident boasting, if it is not to cause unnecessary irritations which may unfortunately prove fissiparous in their cumulative effect. The substance of the law of the crown must always give place to the substance of national liberties; and such unity as we possess, and hope to continue to possess, depends on no institution, not even the monarchy, but on the sovereign wishes of the district sovereign states. The fact that at present the crown is one and indivisible makes it as true as though there were a personal union that the very existence of the crown and of its functions, from which flow legal implications and political significances, depends entirely upon the approval of the citizens of the separate states, who endow it with honour, dignify it with glory and majesty, and confer on it dominion and power.

¹ Cf. W. P. M. Kennedy, Essays in Constitutional Law, pp. 1 ff. (Oxford, 1934).

² 24 & 25 Geo. V, c. 21. Cf. W. P. M. Kennedy, 'British Possessions' in 2 University of Toronto Law Journal, pp. 115 ff.

APPENDIX III

THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867

(30 & 31 Victoria, c. 3).

*An Act for the Union of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the Government thereof: and for Purposes connected therewith.*¹

[March 29, 1867.]

WHEREAS the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom:

And whereas such a Union would conduce to the welfare of the Provinces and promote the interests of the British Empire:

And whereas on the establishment of the Union by authority of Parliament it is expedient, not only that the Constitution of the Legislative Authority in the Dominion be provided for, but also that the nature of the Executive Government therein be declared:

And whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the eventual admission into the Union of other parts of British North America:

Be it therefore enacted and declared by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

I.—PRELIMINARY.

1. This Act may be cited as The British North America Act, 1867. Short title.

2. The provisions of this Act referring to Her Majesty the Queen extend also to the heirs and successors of Her Majesty, Kings and Queens of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Application of provisions referring to the Queen.

II.—UNION.

3. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by Proclamation that on and after a day herein appointed, not being more than Declaration by proclamation of Union of Canada, Nova ¹ Brought into force, pursuant to sect. 3, by royal proclamation, on July 1, 1867.

Scotia and New Brunswick, into one Dominion under name of Canada. six months after the passing of this Act, the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall form and be one Dominion under the name of Canada; and on and after that day those three Provinces shall form and be one Dominion under that name accordingly.

Commencement of subsequent provisions of Act. Meaning of Canada in such provisions. 4. The subsequent provisions of this Act shall, unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, commence and have effect on and after the Union, that is to say, on and after the day appointed for the Union taking effect in the Queen's Proclamation; and in the same provisions, unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, the name Canada shall be taken to mean Canada as constituted under this Act.

Four Provinces. 5. Canada shall be divided into four Provinces, named Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick.

Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. 6. The parts of the Province of Canada (as it exists at the passing of this Act) which formerly constituted respectively the Provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada shall be deemed to be severed, and shall form two separate Provinces. The part which formerly constituted the Province of Upper Canada shall constitute the Province of Ontario and the part which formerly constituted the Province of Lower Canada shall constitute the Province of Quebec.

Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. 7. The Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have the same limits as at the passing of this Act.

Population of Provinces to be distinguished in decennial census. 8. In the general census of the population of Canada which is hereby required to be taken in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and in every tenth year thereafter, the respective populations of the four Provinces shall be distinguished.

III.—EXECUTIVE POWER.

Executive Power to continue vested in the Queen. 9. The Executive Government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Application of provisions referring to Governor-General. 10. The provisions of this Act referring to the Governor-General extend and apply to the Governor-General for the time being of Canada, or other the Chief Executive Officer or Administrator for the time being carrying on the Government of Canada on behalf and in the name of the Queen, by whatever title he is designated.

Constitution of Privy Council for Canada. 11. There shall be a Council to aid and advise in the Government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada; and the persons who are to be members of that Council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor-General and sworn in as Privy Councillors, and members thereof may be from time to time removed by the Governor-General.

12. All powers, authorities, and functions, which under any Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, are at the Union vested in or exercisable by the respective Governors or Lieutenant-Governors of those Provinces, with the advice, or with the advice and consent, of the respective Executive Councils thereof, or in conjunction with those Councils, or with any number of members thereof, or by those Governors, or Lieutenant-Governors individually, shall, as far as the same continue in existence and capable of being exercised after the Union in relation to the Government of Canada, be vested in and exercisable by the Governor-General, with the advice or with the advice and consent of or in connection with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, or any members thereof, or by the Governor-General individually, as the case requires, subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland) to be abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada.

All powers under Acts to be exercised by Governor-General with advice of Privy Council, or alone.

13. The provisions of this Act referring to the Governor-General in Council shall be construed as referring to the Governor-General acting by and with the advice of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

Application of provisions referring to Governor-General in Council.

14. It shall be lawful for the Queen, if Her Majesty thinks fit, to authorize the Governor-General from time to time to appoint any person or any persons jointly or severally to be his Deputy or Deputies within any part or parts of Canada, and in that capacity to exercise during the pleasure of the Governor-General such of the powers, authorities, and functions of the Governor-General as the Governor-General deems it necessary or expedient to assign to him or them, subject to any limitations or directions expressed or given by the Queen; but the appointment of such a Deputy or Deputies shall not affect the exercise by the Governor-General himself of any power, authority or function.

Power to Her Majesty to authorize Governor-General to appoint Deputies.

15. The Command-in-Chief of the Land and Naval Militia, and of all Naval and Military Forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Command of armed forces to continue to be vested in the Queen.

16. Until the Queen otherwise directs the seat of Government of Canada shall be Ottawa.

Seat of Government of Canada.

IV.—LEGISLATIVE POWER.

17. There shall be one Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Constitution of Parliament of Canada. Queen, an Upper House, styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

[Section 18 was repealed by imperial Act 38 & 39 Vict., c. 38, and the following section substituted therefor.]

Privileges, etc., of Houses.

18. The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons and by the members thereof respectively shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and by the members thereof.]

First Session of the Parliament of Canada.

19. The Parliament of Canada shall be called together not later than six months after the Union.

Yearly Session of the Parliament of Canada.

20. There shall be a Session of the Parliament of Canada once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Parliament in one Session and its first sitting in the next Session.

The Senate.

Number of Senators.

21. The Senate shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of seventy-two members,¹ who shall be styled Senators.

Representation of Provinces in Senate.

22. In relation to the constitution of the Senate, Canada shall be deemed to consist of three divisions—

1. Ontario ;
2. Quebec ;

3. The Maritime Provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick ; which three divisions shall (subject to the provisions of this Act) be equally represented in the Senate as follows : Ontario by twenty-four Senators ; Quebec by twenty-four Senators ; and the Maritime Provinces by twenty-four Senators, twelve thereof representing Nova Scotia, and twelve thereof representing New Brunswick.

In the case of Quebec each of the twenty-four Senators representing that Province shall be appointed for one of the twenty-four Electoral Divisions of Lower Canada specified in Schedule A. to chapter one of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada.

Qualifications of Senator.

23. The qualifications of a Senator shall be as follows :—

1. He shall be of the full age of thirty years ;
2. He shall be either a natural-born subject of the Queen, or a subject of the Queen naturalized by an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of one of the Provinces of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, before the Union, or of the Parliament of Canada after the Union ;

¹ See above, p. 384.

3. He shall be legally or equitably seised as of freehold for his own use and benefit of lands or tenements held in free and common socage, or seised or possessed for his own use and benefit of lands or tenements held in franc-aleu or in roture, within the Province for which he is appointed, of the value of $4,000, over and above all rents, dues, debts, charges, mortgages and incumbrances due or payable out of or charged on or affecting the same ;
4. His real and personal property shall be together worth $4,000, over and above his debts and liabilities ;
5. He shall be resident in the Province for which he is appointed ;
6. In the case of Quebec he shall have his real property qualification in the Electoral Division for which he is appointed, or shall be resident in that Division.

24. The Governor-General shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon qualified persons to the Senate ; and, subject to the provisions of this Act, every person so summoned shall become and be a member of the Senate and a Senator.

Summoning of Senators.

25. Such persons shall be first summoned to the Senate as the Queen by warrant under Her Majesty's Royal Sign Manual thinks fit to approve, and their names shall be inserted in the Queen's Proclamation of Union.

Summons of first body of Senators.

26. If at any time on the recommendation of the Governor-General the Queen thinks fit to direct that three or six members¹ be added to the Senate, the Governor-General may by summons to three or six qualified persons (as the case may be), representing equally the three divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

Additions of Senators in certain cases.

27. In case of such addition being at any time made the Governor-General shall not summon any person to the Senate, except on a further like direction by the Queen on the like recommendation, until each of the three divisions of Canada is represented by twenty-four Senators and no more.

Reduction of Senate to normal number.

28. The number of Senators shall not at any time exceed seventy-eight.¹

Maximum number of Senators.

¹ See above, p. 384.

Tenure of place in Senate. 29. A Senator shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, hold his place in the Senate for life.

Resignation of place in Senate. 30. A Senator may by writing under his hand addressed to the Governor-General resign his place in the Senate, and thereupon the same shall be vacant.

Disqualification of Senators. 31. The place of a Senator shall become vacant in any of the following cases :

1. If for two consecutive Sessions of the Parliament he fails to give his attendance in the Senate ;
2. If he takes an oath or makes a declaration or acknowledgment of allegiance, obedience, or adherence to a foreign power, or does an act whereby he becomes a subject or citizen, or entitled to the rights or privileges of a subject or citizen, of a foreign power ;
3. If he is adjudged bankrupt or insolvent, or applies for the benefit of any law relating to insolvent debtors, or becomes a public defaulter ;
4. If he is attainted of treason or convicted of felony or of any infamous crime ;
5. If he ceases to be qualified in respect of property or of residence ; provided, that a Senator shall not be deemed to have ceased to be qualified in respect of residence by reason only of his residing at the seat of the Government of Canada while holding an office under that Government requiring his presence there.

Summons on vacancy in Senate. 32. When a vacancy happens in the Senate by resignation, death, or otherwise, the Governor-General shall by summons to a fit and qualified person fill the vacancy.

Questions as to qualifications and vacancies in Senate. 33. If any question arises respecting the qualification of a Senator or a vacancy in the Senate, the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

Appointment of Speaker of Senate. 34. The Governor-General may from time to time, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, appoint a Senator to be Speaker of the Senate, and may remove him and appoint another in his stead.

Quorum of Senate. 35. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the presence of at least fifteen Senators, including the Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers.

Voting in Senate. 36. Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices, and the Speaker shall in all cases have a vote, and when the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

The House of Commons.

37. The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of one hundred and eighty-one members, of whom eighty-two shall be elected for Ontario, sixty-five for Quebec, nineteen for Nova Scotia, and fifteen for New Brunswick.

Constitution of House of Commons in Canada.

38. The Governor-General shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon and call together the House of Commons.

Summoning of House of Commons.

39. A Senator shall not be capable of being elected or of sitting or voting as a member of the House of Commons.

Senators not to sit in House of Commons.

40. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall, for the purposes of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into Electoral Districts as follows:—

Electoral districts of the four Provinces.

1.—ONTARIO.

Ontario shall be divided into the Counties, Ridings of Counties, Cities, parts of Cities, and Towns enumerated in the first Schedule to this Act, each whereof shall be an Electoral District, each such District as numbered in that Schedule being entitled to return one member.

2.—QUEBEC.

Quebec shall be divided into sixty-five Electoral Districts, composed of the sixty-five Electoral Divisions into which Lower Canada is at the passing of this Act divided under chapter two of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, chapter seventy-five of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, and the Act of the Province of Canada of the twenty-third year of the Queen, chapter one, or any other Act amending the same in force at the Union, so that each such Electoral Division shall be for the purposes of this Act an Electoral District entitled to return one member.

3.—NOVA SCOTIA.

Each of the eighteen Counties of Nova Scotia shall be an Electoral District. The County of Halifax shall be entitled to return two members, and each of the other Counties one member.

4.—NEW BRUNSWICK.

Each of the fourteen Counties into which New Brunswick is divided, including the City and County of St. John, shall be an Electoral District; the City of St. John shall also be a separate Electoral District. Each of those fifteen Electoral Districts shall be entitled to return one member.

Continuance of existing election laws until Parliament of Canada otherwise provides.

41. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to the following matters or any of them, namely,—the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several Provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the Returning Officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections, and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution,—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several Provinces.

Provided that, until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, at any election for a Member of the House of Commons for the District of Algoma, in addition to persons qualified by the law of the Province of Canada to vote, every male British subject aged twenty-one years or upwards, being a householder, shall have a vote.

Writs for first election.

42. For the first election of members to serve in the House of Commons the Governor-General shall cause writs to be issued by such persons, in such form, and addressed to such Returning Officers as he thinks fit.

The person issuing writs under this section shall have the like powers as are possessed at the Union by the officers charged with the issuing of writs for the election of members to serve in the respective House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick ; and the Returning Officers to whom writs are directed under this section shall have the like powers as are possessed at the Union by the officers charged with the returning of writs for the election of members to serve in the same respective House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly.

As to vacancies before meeting of Parliament or before provision is made by Parliament
in this behalf.

43. In case a vacancy in the representation in the House of Commons of any Electoral District happens before the meeting of the Parliament, or after the meeting of the Parliament before provision is made by the Parliament in this behalf, the provisions of the last foregoing section of this Act shall extend and apply to the issuing and returning of a writ in respect of such vacant District.

As to election of Speaker of House of Commons.

44. The House of Commons on its first assembling after a general election shall proceed with all practicable speed to elect one of its members to be Speaker.

As to filling up vacancy

45. In case of a vacancy happening in the office of Speaker by death, resignation or otherwise, the House of Commons shall with all practicable speed proceed to elect another of its members to be Speaker. in office of Speaker.

46. The Speaker shall preside at all meetings of the House of Commons. Speaker to preside.

47. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, in case of the absence for any reason of the Speaker from the chair of the House of Commons for a period of forty-eight consecutive hours, the House may elect another of its members to act as Speaker, and the member so elected shall during the continuance of such absence of the Speaker have and execute all the powers, privileges, and duties of Speaker. Provision in case of absence of Speaker.

48. The presence of at least twenty members of the House of Commons shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers, and for that purpose the Speaker shall be reckoned as a member. Quorum of House of Commons.

49. Questions arising in the House of Commons shall be decided by a majority of voices other than that of the Speaker, and when the voices are equal, but not otherwise, the Speaker shall have a vote. Voting in House of Commons.

50. Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor-General), and no longer. Duration of House of Commons.

51. On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four Provinces shall be re-adjusted by such authority, in such manner and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules :— Decennial Re-adjustment of Representation.

1. Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members.
2. There shall be assigned to each of the other Provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number of sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained).
3. In the computation of the number of members for a Province a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the Province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number.
4. On any such re-adjustment the number of members for a Province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the Province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding re-adjustment of the number of members for the Province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards.

5. Such re-adjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing Parliament.

Increase of number of
House of Commons.

52. The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the Provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

Money Votes ; Royal Assent.

Appropriation and tax bills.

53. Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Recommendation of money votes.

54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor-General in the Session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

Royal assent to bills, etc.

55. Where a bill passed by the Houses of the Parliament is presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent, he shall declare according to his discretion, but subject to the provisions of this Act and to Her Majesty's instructions, either that he assents thereto in the Queen's name, or that he withholds the Queen's assent, or that he reserves the bill for the signification of the Queen's pleasure.

Disallowance
by Order in Council of Act, assented to by Governor-
General.

56. Where the Governor-General assents to a bill in the Queen's name, he shall by the first convenient opportunity send an authentic copy of the Act to one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State ; and if the Queen in Council within two years after the receipt thereof by the Secretary of State thinks fit to disallow the Act, such disallowance (with a certificate of the Secretary of State of the day on which the Act was received by him) being signified by the Governor-General by speech or message to each of the Houses of the Parliament, or by proclamation, shall annul the Act from and after the day of such signification.

Signification of Queen's pleasure on bill reserved.

57. A bill reserved for the signification of the Queen's pleasure shall not have any force unless and until within two years from the day on which it was presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent, the Governor-General signifies, by speech or message to each of the Houses of the Parliament or by proclamation, that it has received the assent of the Queen in Council.

An entry of every such speech, message, or proclamation shall be made in the Journal of each House, and a duplicate thereof duly attested shall be delivered to the proper officer to be kept among the Records of Canada.

V.—PROVINCIAL CONSTITUTIONS.

Executive Power.

58. For each Province there shall be an officer, styled the Lieutenant-Governor, appointed by the Governor-General in Council by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada.

Appointment of Lieutenant-Governors of Provinces.

59. A Lieutenant-Governor shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor-General; but any Lieutenant-Governor appointed after the commencement of the first Session of the Parliament of Canada shall not be removable within five years from his appointment, except for cause assigned, which shall be communicated to him in writing within one month after the order for his removal is made, and shall be communicated by message to the Senate and to the House of Commons within one week thereafter if the Parliament is then sitting, and if not then within one week after the commencement of the next Session of the Parliament.

Tenure of office of Lieutenant-Governor.

60. The salaries of the Lieutenant-Governors shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

Salaries of Lieutenant-Governors.

61. Every Lieutenant-Governor shall, before assuming the duties of his office, make and subscribe before the Governor-General or some person authorized by him, oaths of allegiance and office similar to those taken by the Governor-General.

Oaths, etc., of Lieutenant-Governor.

62. The provisions of this Act referring to the Lieutenant-Governor extend and apply to the Lieutenant-Governor for the time being of each Province or other the chief executive officer or administrator for the time being carrying on the government of the Province, by whatever title he is designated.

Application of provisions referring to Lieutenant-Governor.

63. The Executive Council of Ontario and of Quebec shall be composed of such persons as the Lieutenant-Governor from time to time thinks fit, and in the first instance of the following officers, namely:—The Attorney-General, the Secretary and Registrar of the Province, the Treasurer of the Province, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and the Commissioner of Agriculture and Public Works, with in Quebec, the Speaker of the Legislative Council and the Solicitor-General.

Appointment of executive officers for Ontario and Quebec.

Executive Government of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

64. The Constitution of the Executive Authority in each of the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, continue as it exists at the Union until altered under the authority of this Act.

All powers under Acts to be exercised by Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario or Quebec with advice of Executive Council or alone.

65. All powers, authorities, and functions which under any Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, or Canada, were or are before or at the Union vested in or exercisable by the respective Governors or Lieutenant-Governors of those Provinces, with the advice, or with the advice and consent, of the respective Executive Councils thereof, or in conjunction with those Councils, or with any number of members thereof, or by those Governors or Lieutenant-Governors individually, shall, as far as the same are capable of being exercised after the Union in relation to the Government of Ontario and Quebec respectively, be vested in and shall or may be exercised by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario and Quebec respectively, with the advice or with the advice and consent of or in conjunction with the respective Executive Councils, or any members thereof, or by the Lieutenant-Governor individually, as the case requires, subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland) to be abolished or altered by the respective Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec.

Application of provisions referring to Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

66. The provisions of this Act referring to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall be construed as referring to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council thereof.

Administration in absence, etc., of Lieutenant-Governor.

67. The Governor-General in Council may from time to time appoint an administrator to execute the office and functions of Lieutenant-Governor during his absence, illness, or other inability.

Seats of Provincial Governments.

68. Unless and until the Executive Government of any Province otherwise directs with respect to that Province, the seats of Government of the Provinces shall be as follows, namely,—of Ontario, the City of Toronto; of Quebec, the City of Quebec; of Nova Scotia, the City of Halifax; and of New Brunswick, the City of Fredericton.

Legislative Power.

1.—ONTARIO.

Legislature for Ontario.

69. There shall be a Legislature for Ontario consisting of the Lieutenant-Governor and of one House, styled the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

70. The Legislative Assembly of Ontario shall be composed of eighty-two members to be elected to represent the eighty-two Electoral Districts set forth in the first Schedule to this Act.

2.—QUEBEC.

71. There shall be a Legislature for Quebec consisting of the Lieutenant-Governor and of two Houses, styled the Legislative Council of Quebec and the Legislative Assembly of Quebec.

Legislature for Quebec.

72. The Legislative Council of Quebec shall be composed of twenty-four members, to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in the Queen's name, by instrument under the Great Seal of Quebec, one being appointed to represent each of the twenty-four electoral divisions of Lower Canada in this Act referred to, and each holding office for the term of his life, unless the Legislature of Quebec otherwise provides under the provisions of this Act.

Constitution of Legislative Council.

73. The qualifications of the Legislative Councillors of Quebec shall be the same as those of the Senators for Quebec.

Qualification of Legislative Councillors.

74. The place of a Legislative Councillor of Quebec shall become vacant in the cases mutatis mutandis, in which the place of Senator becomes vacant.

Resignation, Disqualification, etc.

75. When a vacancy happens in the Legislative Council of Quebec, by resignation, death, or otherwise, the Lieutenant-Governor, in the Queen's name by instrument under the Great Seal of Quebec, shall appoint a fit and qualified person to fill the vacancy.

Vacancies.

76. If any question arises respecting the qualification of a Legislative Councillor of Quebec, or a vacancy in the Legislative Council of Quebec, the same shall be heard and determined by the Legislative Council.

Questions as to Vacancies, etc.

77. The Lieutenant-Governor may from time to time, by instrument under the Great Seal of Quebec, appoint a member of the Legislative Council of Quebec to be Speaker thereof, and may remove him and appoint another in his stead.

Speaker of Legislative Council.

78. Until the Legislature of Quebec otherwise provides, the presence of at least ten members of the Legislative Council, including the Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a meeting for the exercise of its powers.

Quorum of Legislative Council.

79. Questions arising in the Legislative Council of Quebec shall be decided by a majority of voices, and the Speaker shall in all cases have a vote, and when the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

Voting in Legislative Council.

Constitution
of Legislative Assembly of Quebec.

80. The Legislative Assembly of Quebec shall be composed of sixty-five members, to be elected to represent the sixty-five electoral divisions or districts of Lower Canada in this Act referred to, subject to alteration thereof by the Legislature of Quebec: Provided that it shall not be lawful to present to the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec for assent any bill for altering the limits of any of the Electoral Divisions or Districts mentioned in the second Schedule to this Act, unless the second and third readings of such bill have been passed in the Legislative Assembly with the concurrence of the majority of the members representing all those Electoral Divisions or Districts, and the assent shall not be given to such bills unless an address has been presented by the Legislative Assembly to the Lieutenant-Governor stating that it has been so passed.

3.—ONTARIO AND QUEBEC.

First Session of Legislatures.

81. The Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec respectively shall be called together not later than six months after the Union.

Summoning of Legislative Assemblies.

82. The Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario and of Quebec shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the Great Seal of the Province summon and call together the Legislative Assembly of the Province.

Restriction on election of holders of office.

83. Until the Legislature of Ontario or of Quebec otherwise provides, a person accepting or holding in Ontario or in Quebec any office, commission, or employment permanent or temporary, at the nomination of the Lieutenant-Governor, to which an annual salary, or any fee, allowance, emolument, or profit of any kind or amount whatever from the Province is attached, shall not be eligible as a member of the Legislative Assembly of the respective Province, nor shall he sit or vote as such; but nothing in this section shall make ineligible any person being a member of the Executive Council of the respective Province, or holding any of the following offices, that is to say, the offices of Attorney-General, Secretary and Registrar of the Province, Treasurer of the Province, Commissioner of Crown Lands, and Commissioner of Agriculture and Public Works, and, in Quebec, Solicitor-General, or shall disqualify him to sit or vote in the House for which he is elected, provided he is elected while holding such office.

Continuance
of existing election laws.

84. Until the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec respectively otherwise provide, all laws which at the Union are in force in those Provinces respectively, relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely,—the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the Assembly of Canada, the qualifications or disqualifications of voters, the oaths to be taken by voters, the Returning Officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which such elections may be continued, and the trial of controverted elections and the proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of the seats of members and the issuing and execution of new writs in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution, shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the respective Legislative Assemblies of Ontario and Quebec.

Provided that until the Legislature of Ontario otherwise provides, at any election for a member of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario for the District of Algoma, in addition to persons qualified by the law of the Province of Canada to vote, every male British Subject, aged twenty-one years or upwards, being a householder, shall have a vote.

85. Every Legislative Assembly of Ontario and every Legislative Assembly of Quebec shall continue for four years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the same (subject nevertheless to either the Legislative Assembly of Ontario or the Legislative Assembly of Quebec being sooner dissolved by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province), and no longer.

Duration of Legislative Assemblies.

86. There shall be a session of the Legislature of Ontario and of that of Quebec once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Legislature in each Province in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

Yearly Sessions of Legislature.

87. The following provisions of this Act respecting the House of Commons of Canada shall extend and apply to the Legislative Assemblies of Ontario and Quebec, that is to say,—the provisions relating to the election of a Speaker originally and on vacancies, the duties of the Speaker, the absence of the Speaker, the quorum, and the mode of voting, as if those provisions were here re-enacted and made applicable in terms to each such Legislative Assembly.

Speaker,
Quorum, etc.

4.—NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK.

88. The constitution of the Legislature of each of the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, continue as it exists at the Union until altered under the authority of this Act; and the House of Assembly of New Brunswick existing at the passing of this Act shall, unless sooner dissolved, continue for the period for which it was elected.

Constitutions of Legislatures of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

5.—ONTARIO, QUEBEC, AND NOVA SCOTIA.

First elections. 89. Each of the Lieutenant-Governors of Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia shall cause writs to be issued for the first election of members of the Legislative Assembly thereof in such form and by such person as he thinks fit, and at such time and addressed to such Returning Officer as the Governor-General directs, and so that the first election of members of Assembly for any Electoral District or any subdivision thereof shall be held at the same time and at the same places as the election for a member to serve in the House of Commons of Canada for that Electoral District.

6.—THE FOUR PROVINCES.

Application to Legislatures of provisions respecting money votes, etc. 90. The following provisions of this Act respecting the Parliament of Canada, namely,—the provisions relating to appropriation and tax bills, the recommendation of money votes, the assent to bills, the disallowance of Acts, and the signification of pleasure on bills reserved,—shall extend and apply to the Legislatures of the several Provinces as if those provisions were here re-enacted and made applicable in terms to the respective Provinces and the Legislatures thereof, with the substitution of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province for the Governor-General, of the Governor-General for the Queen and for a Secretary of State, of one year for two years, and of the Province for Canada.

VI.—DISTRIBUTION OF LEGISLATIVE POWERS.

Powers of the Parliament.

Legislative authority of Parliament of Canada. 91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:—

1. The Public Debt and Property.
2. The regulation of Trade and Commerce.
3. The raising of money by any mode or system of Taxation.
4. The borrowing of money on the public credit.
5. Postal service.

6. The Census and Statistics.
7. Militia, Military and Naval Service, and Defence.
8. The fixing of and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the Government of Canada.
9. Beacons, Buoys, Lighthouses, and Sable Island.
10. Navigation and Shipping.
11. Quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of Marine Hospitals.
12. Sea Coast and inland Fisheries.
13. Ferries between a Province and any British or Foreign country or between two Provinces.
14. Currency and Coinage.
15. Banking, incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money.
16. Savings Banks.
17. Weights and Measures.
18. Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes.
19. Interest.
20. Legal tender.
21. Bankruptcy and Insolvency.
22. Patents of invention and discovery.
23. Copyrights.
24. Indians, and lands reserved for the Indians.
25. Naturalization and Aliens.
26. Marriage and Divorce.
27. The Criminal Law, except the Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the Procedure in Criminal Matters.
28. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Penitentiaries.
29. Such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

And any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures.

92. In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws Subjects of exclusive Provincial Legislation.

in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

1. The Amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the Constitution of the Province, except as regards the office of Lieutenant-Governor.
2. Direct Taxation within the Province in order to the raising of a Revenue for Provincial purposes.
3. The borrowing of money on the sole credit of the Province.
4. The establishment and tenure of Provincial offices and the appointment and payment of Provincial officers.
5. The management and sale of the Public Lands belonging to the Province and of the timber and wood thereon.
6. The establishment, maintenance, and management of public and reformatory prisons in and for the Province.
7. The establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, and eleemosynary institutions in and for the Province, other than marine hospitals.
8. Municipal institutions in the Province.
9. Shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer, and other licenses in order to the raising of a revenue for Provincial, local, or municipal purposes.
10. Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes,—
 - a.* Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the Province ;
 - b.* Lines of steam ships between the Province and any British or Foreign country ;
 - c.* Such works as, although wholly situate within the Province, are before or after their execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the Provinces.
11. The incorporation of companies with Provincial objects.
12. The solemnization of marriage in the Province.
13. Property and civil rights in the Province.
14. The administration of justice in the Province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of Provincial Courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those Courts.

15. The imposition of punishment by fine, penalty, or imprisonment for enforcing any law of the Province made in relation to any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section.
16. Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province.

Education.

93. In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions :— Legislation respecting education.

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the Province at the union.
2. All the powers, privileges, and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects shall be and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.
3. Where in any Province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the Union or is thereafter established by the Legislature of the Province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor-General in Council from any Act or decision of any Provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.
4. In case any such Provincial law as from time to time seems to the Governor-General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor-General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper Provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section and of any decision of the Governor-General in Council under this section.

Uniformity of Laws in Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

94. Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the Parliament of Canada may make provision for the uniformity of all or any of the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia and Legislation for uniformity of laws in the three Provinces as to property and civil rights and uniformity of procedure in Courts. New Brunswick, and of the procedure of all or any of the Courts in those three Provinces; and from and after the passing of any Act in that behalf the power of the Parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to any matter comprised in any such Act shall, notwithstanding anything in this Act, be unrestricted; but any Act of the Parliament of Canada making provision for such uniformity shall not have effect in any Province unless and until it is adopted and enacted as law by the Legislature thereof.

Agriculture and Immigration.

Concurrent powers of Legislation respecting agriculture and immigration. 95. In each Province the Legislature may make laws in relation to Agriculture in the Province, and to Immigration into the Province; and it is hereby declared that the Parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to Agriculture in all or any of the Provinces, and to Immigration into all or any of the Provinces; and any law of the Legislature of a Province relative to Agriculture or to Immigration shall have effect in and for the Province as long and as far only as it is not repugnant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

VII.—JUDICATURE.

Appointment of Judges. 96. The Governor-General shall appoint the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts in each Province, except those of the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Selection of Judges in Ontario, etc. 97. Until the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the procedure of the Courts of those Provinces, are made uniform, the Judges of the Courts of those Provinces appointed by the Governor-General shall be selected from the respective Bars of those Provinces.

Selection of Judges in Quebec. 98. The Judges of the Courts of Quebec shall be selected from the Bar of that Province.

Tenure of office of Judges of Superior Courts. 99. The Judges of the Superior Courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor-General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Salaries, etc., of Judges. 100. The salaries, allowances and pensions of the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts (except the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick), and of the Admiralty Courts in cases where the Judges thereof are for the time being paid by salary, shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

General Court of Appeal, etc. 101. The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance, and organization of a general Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional Courts for the better administration of the Laws of Canada.

VIII.—REVENUES ; DEBTS ; ASSETS ; TAXATION.

102. All duties and revenues over which the respective Legislatures of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick before and at the Union had and have power of appropriation, except such portions thereof as are by this Act reserved to the respective Legislatures of the Provinces, or are raised by them in accordance with the special powers conferred on them by this Act, shall form one Consolidated Revenue Fund, to be appropriated for the public service of Canada in the manner and subject to the charges in this Act provided.

Creation of Consolidated Revenue Fund.

103. The Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada shall be permanently charged with the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the collection, management, and receipt thereof, and the same shall form the first charge thereon, subject to be reviewed and audited in such manner as shall be ordered by the Governor-General in Council until the Parliament otherwise provides.

Expenses of collection, etc.

104. The annual interest of the public debts of the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union shall form the second charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Interest of Provincial public debts.

105. Unless altered by the Parliament of Canada, the salary of the Governor-General shall be ten thousand pounds sterling money of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, and the same shall form the third charge thereon.

Salary of Governor-General.

106. Subject to the several payments by this Act charged on the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, the same shall be appropriated by the Parliament of Canada for the public service.

Appropriation of fund subject to charges.

107. All stocks, cash, banker's balances, and securities for money belonging to each Province at the time of the Union, except as in this Act mentioned, shall be the property of Canada, and shall be taken in reduction of the amount of the respective debts of the Province at the Union.

Transfer to Canada of stocks, etc., belonging to two Provinces.

108. The public works and property of each Province, enumerated in the third Schedule to this Act, shall be the property of Canada.

Transfer of property in schedule.

109. All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the Union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several Provinces of Lands, mines, etc., belonging to Provinces to belong to them.

Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than of the Province in the same.

Assets connected with Provincial debts.

110. All assets connected with such portions of the public debt of each Province as are assumed by that Province shall belong to that Province.

Canada to be liable for Provincial debts.

111. Canada shall be liable for the debts and liabilities of each Province existing at the Union.

Liability of Ontario and Quebec to Canada.

112. Ontario and Quebec conjointly shall be liable to Canada for the amount (if any) by which the debt of the Province of Canada exceeds at the Union $62,500,000, and shall be charged with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum thereon.

Assets of Ontario and Quebec.

113. The assets enumerated in the fourth Schedule to this Act belonging at the Union to the Province of Canada shall be the property of Ontario and Quebec conjointly.

Liability of Nova Scotia to Canada.

114. Nova Scotia shall be liable to Canada for the amount (if any) by which its public debt exceeds at the Union $8,000,000, and shall be charged with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum thereon.

Liability of New Brunswick to Canada.

115. New Brunswick shall be liable to Canada for the amount (if any) by which its public debt exceeds at the Union $7,000,000, and shall be charged with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum thereon.

Payment of interest to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick if their public debts are less than the stipulated amounts.

116. In case the public debts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick do not at the Union amount to $8,000,000 and $7,000,000 respectively, they shall respectively receive by half-yearly payments in advance from the Government of Canada interest at five per centum per annum on the difference between the actual amounts of their respective debts and such stipulated amounts.

Provincial public property.

117. The several Provinces shall retain all their respective public property not otherwise disposed of in this Act, subject to the right of Canada to assume any lands or public property required for fortifications or for the defence of the country.

Grants to Provinces.

118. The following sums shall be paid yearly by Canada to the several Provinces for the support of their Governments and Legislatures :—

Dollars.

Ontario	Eighty thousand.
Quebec	Seventy thousand.
Nova Scotia	Sixty thousand.
New Brunswick	Fifty thousand.

Two hundred and sixty thousand.

And an annual grant in aid of each Province shall be made, equal to eighty cents per head of the population as ascertained by the Census of 1861, and in case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, by each subsequent decennial census until the population of each of those two Provinces amounts to four hundred thousand souls, at which rate such grant shall thereafter remain. Such grants shall be in full settlement of all future demands on Canada, and shall be paid half-yearly in advance to each Province; but the Government of Canada shall deduct from such grants, as against any Province, all sums chargeable as interest on the Public Debt of that Province in excess of the several amounts stipulated in this Act.

119. New Brunswick shall receive by half-yearly payments in advance from Canada, for the period of ten years from the Union, an additional allowance of $63,000 per annum; but as long as the Public Debt of that Province remains under $7,000,000, a deduction equal to the interest at five per centum per annum on such deficiency shall be made from that allowance of $63,000.

Further grant to New Brunswick for ten years.

120. All payments to be made under this Act, or in discharge of liabilities created under any Act of the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respectively, and assumed by Canada, shall, until the Parliament of Canada otherwise directs, be made in such form and manner as may from time to time be ordered by the Governor-General in Council.

Form of payments.

121. All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the Provinces shall, from and after the Union, be admitted free into each of the other Provinces.

Manufactures, etc., of one Province to be admitted free into the others.

122. The Customs and Excise Laws of each Province shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, continue in force until altered by the Parliament of Canada.

Continuance of Customs and Excise Laws.

123. Where Customs duties are, at the Union, leviable on any goods, wares, or merchandises in any two Provinces, those goods, wares and merchandises may, from and after the Union, be imported from one of those Provinces into the other of them on proof of payment of the Customs duty leviable thereon in the Province of exportation, and on payment of such further amount (if any) of Customs duty as is leviable thereon in the Province of importation.

Exportation and importation as between two Provinces.

124. Nothing in this Act shall affect the right of New Brunswick to levy the lumber dues provided in chapter fifteen of title three of the Revised Statutes of New Brunswick, or in any Act amending that Act before or after the Union, and not increasing the amount of such dues ; but the lumber of any of the Provinces other than New Brunswick shall not be subjected to such dues.

Lumber dues in New Brunswick.

Exemption of public lands, etc., from taxation.
Provincial Consolidated Revenue Funds.

125. No lands or property belonging to Canada or any Province shall be liable to taxation.

126. Such portions of the duties and revenues over which the respective Legislatures of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had before the Union power of appropriation as are by this Act reserved to the respective Governments or Legislatures of the Provinces, and all duties and revenues raised by them in accordance with the special powers conferred upon them by this Act, shall in each Province form one Consolidated Revenue Fund to be appropriated for the public service of the Province.

IX.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

General.

As to Legislative Councillors of Provinces becoming Senators.

127. If any person being at the passing of this Act a Member of the Legislative Council of Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, to whom a place in the Senate is offered, does not within thirty days thereafter, by writing under his hand, addressed to the Governor-General of the Province of Canada, or to the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick (as the case may be), accept the same, he shall be deemed to have declined the same ; and any person who, being at the passing of this Act a member of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, accepts a place in the Senate, shall thereby vacate his seat in such Legislative Council.

Oath of allegiance, etc.

128. Every member of the Senate or House of Commons of Canada shall, before taking his seat therein, take and subscribe before the Governor-General or some person authorized by him, and every member of a Legislative Council or Legislative Assembly of any Province shall, before taking his seat therein, take and subscribe before the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province or some person authorized by him, the oath of allegiance contained in the fifth Schedule to this Act ; and every member of the Senate of Canada and every member of the Legislative Council of Quebec shall also, before taking his seat therein, take and subscribe before the Governor-General or some person authorized by him, the declaration of qualification contained in the same Schedule.

Continuance
of existing laws, courts, officers, etc.

129. Except as otherwise provided by this Act, all laws in force in Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick at the Union, and all Courts of civil and military jurisdiction, and all legal commissions, powers and authorities, and all officers, judicial, administrative and ministerial, existing therein at the Union, shall continue in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respectively, as if the Union had not been made; subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as are enacted by or exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland) to be repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada, or by the Legislature of the respective Province, according to the authority of the Parliament or of that Legislature under this Act.

130. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all officers of the several Provinces having duties to discharge in relation to matters other than those coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces shall be officers of Canada, and shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices under the same liabilities, responsibilities and penalties as if the Union had not been made.

Transfer of officers to Canada.

131. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the Governor-General in Council may from time to time appoint such officers as the Governor-General in Council deems necessary or proper for the effectual execution of this Act.

Appointment of new officers.

132. The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any Province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries, arising under treaties between the Empire and such foreign countries.

Power for performance of treaty obligations by Canada as part of British Empire.

133. Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any Court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the Courts of Quebec.

Use of English and French languages.

The Acts of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

Ontario and Quebec.

134. Until the Legislature of Ontario or of Quebec otherwise provides, the Lieutenant-Governors of Ontario and Quebec may each appoint under the Great Seal of the Province the following officers, to hold office during pleasure, that is to say:—the Attorney-General, the Secretary and Registrar of the Province, the Treasurer of the Appointment of executive officers for Ontario and Quebec.

Province, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and the Commissioner of Agriculture and Public Works, and in the case of Quebec the Solicitor-General; and may, by order of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, from time to time prescribe the duties of those officers and of the several departments over which they shall preside or to which they shall belong, and of the officers and clerks thereof; and may also appoint other and additional officers to hold office during pleasure, and may from time to time prescribe the duties of those officers, and of the several departments over which they shall preside or to which they shall belong, and of the officers and clerks thereof.

135. Until the Legislature of Ontario or Quebec otherwise provides, all rights, powers, duties, functions, responsibilities or authorities at the passing of this Act vested in or imposed on the Attorney-General, Solicitor-General, Secretary and Registrar of the Province of Canada, Minister of Finance, Commissioner of Crown Lands, Commissioner of Public Works, and Minister of Agriculture and Receiver-General, by any law, statute or ordinance of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, or Canada, and not repugnant to this Act, shall be vested in or imposed on any officer to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor for the discharge of the same or any of them; and the Commissioner of Agriculture and Public Works shall perform the duties and functions of the office of Minister of Agriculture at the passing of this Act imposed by the law of the Province of Canada, as well as those of the Commissioner of Public Works.

136. Until altered by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, the Great Seals of Ontario and of Quebec respectively shall be the same, or of the same design, as those used in the Provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada respectively before their Union as the Province of Canada.

137. The words 'and from thence to the end of the then next ensuing Session of the Legislature,' or words to the same effect, used in any temporary Act of the Province of Canada not expired before the Union, shall be construed to extend and apply to the next Session of the Parliament of Canada, if the subject-matter of the Act is within the powers of the same, as defined by this Act, or to the next Sessions of the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec respectively, if the subject-matter of the Act is within the powers of the same as defined by this Act.

138. From and after the Union, the use of the words 'Upper Canada' instead of 'Ontario', or 'Lower Canada' instead of 'Quebec', in any deed, writ, process, pleading, document, matter or thing, shall not invalidate the same.

139. Any Proclamation under the Great Seal of the Province of Canada issued before the Union to take effect at a time which is subsequent to the Union, whether relating to that Province, or to Upper Canada, or to Lower Canada, and the several matters and things therein proclaimed, shall be and continue of like force and effect as if the Union had not been made.

As to issue of Proclamations before Union, to commence after Union.

140. Any Proclamation which is authorized by any Act of the Legislature of the Province of Canada to be issued under the Great Seal of the Province of Canada, whether relating to that Province, or to Upper Canada, or to Lower Canada, and which is not issued before the Union, may be issued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario or of Quebec, as its subject-matter requires, under the Great Seal thereof; and from and after the issue of such Proclamation the same and the several matters and things therein proclaimed shall be and continue of the like force and effect in Ontario or Quebec as if the Union had not been made.

As to issue of Proclamations after Union under authority of Acts before Union.

141. The Penitentiary of the Province of Canada shall, until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, be and continue the Penitentiary of Ontario and of Quebec.

Penitentiary.

142. The division and adjustment of the debts, credits, liabilities, properties and assets of Upper Canada and Lower Canada shall be referred to the arbitrament of three arbitrators, one chosen by the Government of Ontario, one by the Government of Quebec and one by the Government of Canada; and the selection of the arbitrators shall not be made until the Parliament of Canada and the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec have met; and the arbitrator chosen by the Government of Canada shall not be a resident either in Ontario or in Quebec.

Arbitration respecting debts, etc.

143. The Governor-General in Council may from time to time order that such and so many of the records, books, and documents of the Province of Canada as he thinks fit shall be appropriated and delivered either to Ontario or to Quebec, and the same shall henceforth be the property of that Province; and any copy thereof or extract therefrom duly certified by the officer having charge of the original thereof shall be admitted as evidence.

Division of records.

144. The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec may from time to time, by Proclamation under the Great Seal of the Province, to take effect from a day to be appointed therein, constitute townships in those parts of the Province of Quebec in which townships are not then already constituted, and fix the metes and bounds thereof.

Constitution of townships in Quebec.

X.—INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Duty of Government and Parliament of Canada to make railway herein described.

145. Inasmuch as the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have joined in a declaration that the construction of the Intercolonial Railway is essential to the consolidation of the Union of British North America, and to the assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and have consequently agreed that provision should be made for its immediate construction by the Government of Canada : Therefore, in order to give effect to that agreement, it shall be the duty of the Government and Parliament of Canada to provide for the commencement within six months after the Union, of a railway connecting the River St. Lawrence with the City of Halifax in Nova Scotia, and for the construction thereof without intermission, and the completion thereof with all practicable speed.

XI.—ADMISSION OF OTHER COLONIES.

Power to admit Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Rupert's Land and North-western Territory into the Union by Order in Council.

146. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, on Addresses from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada, and from the Houses of the respective Legislatures of the Colonies or Provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia, to admit those Colonies or Provinces, or any of them, into the Union, and on Address from the Houses of the Parliament of Canada to admit Rupert's Land and the North-western Territory, or either of them, into the Union, on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the Addresses expressed and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this Act, and the provisions of any Order in Council in that behalf shall have effect as if they had been enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

As to representation of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island in Senate.

147. In case of the admission of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, or either of them, each shall be entitled to a representation in the Senate of Canada of four members, and (notwithstanding anything in this Act) in case of the admission of Newfoundland the normal number of Senators shall be seventy-six and their maximum number shall be eighty-two; but Prince Edward Island when admitted shall be deemed to be comprised in the third of the three divisions into which Canada is, in relation to the constitution of the Senate, divided by this Act, and accordingly, after the admission of Prince Edward Island, whether Newfoundland is admitted or not, the representation of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in the Senate shall, as vacancies occur, be reduced from twelve to ten members respectively, and the representation of each of those Provinces shall not be increased at any time beyond ten, except under the provisions of this Act for the appointment of three or six additional Senators under the direction of the Queen.

INDEX

NOTE: (a) Titled personages are indexed as a rule under their titles and not under their family names.

(b) Cases are not indexed. They can be referred to in the Table of Cases.

(c) The 'Authorities' are not indexed. The footnotes are indexed, with the exception of unpublished manuscripts and dispatches, parliamentary reports and papers, published collections of documents, letters and correspondence, and Acts of parliament.

ABDICATION OF EDWARD VIII, 554-64.

ACADIANS, THE, 30.

ACT OF HIS MAJESTY'S DECLARATION OF ABDICATION, 560-1.

ACT OF SETTLEMENT (12 and 13 William III, c. 2), 378, 561.

ACT OF SUPREMACY (1 Elizabeth, c. 1), 3, 51, 83, 92, 103.

ACT RESPECTING ALTERATION IN THE LAW TOUCHING THE SUCCESSION, 562-3.

Additional Papers concerning the Province of Quebec, by Francis Masères, 72 note 4.

Addresses presented . . . to . . . Metcalfe, 243 note 1.

ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, 461-83.

ADMIRALTY, DOMINION COURT OF, 394-5.

AGRICULTURE, concurrent legislative power over in the dominion, 433, 434, 437.

ALBERTA, PROVINCE OF, its creation, 330; unicameral legislature in, 391; and divorce, 396.

ALGOMA, 387.

ALIEN ACT OF 1804, 120, 134.

ALIENS, create problem in Upper Canada, 127, 128, 137-8; legislative control over in the dominion, 433, 434.

ALLEN, PROFESSOR C. K., 480 note 5.

ALLIER, JACQUES, appointed judge for Berthier by Murray, 26.

ALLIN, C. D., author of Annexation, Preferential Trade, and Reciprocity, and British North American League, 1849, 260 note 3.

ALTERATION OF THE CONSTITUTION, in the Canadas, 163; in the dominion, 450-1, 515, 528-33, 554; in the provinces, 391, 392, 393, 430.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR, its influence on constitutional development, 5, 281, 291-2, 302; its influence on defence' 276-7; and British and Canadian public opinion, 291-2; its political nomenclature, 403.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION, THE, its influence on the Quebec Act, 56, 63, 64; its influence on the province of Quebec, 69; on British North America, 71, 73, 75; its constitutional machinery, 402.

AMHERST, SIR JEFFREY, BARON, (1717-97), his military achievement, 23; appoints Burton governor of Three Rivers and Gage governor of Montreal, 26; organizes administration of Three Rivers and Montreal, 27; his instructions to Burton and Gage, ib.

An Appeal to the Public: stating and considering the Objections to the Quebec Act, by Thomas Bernard, 63 note 2.

ANGLICAN CHURCH, its position in Canada, 3, 4; its position under Murray's instructions, 39; its position under the Constitutional Act, 82, 83; its privileges in Upper Canada, 117, 120; weakened by immigration, 128; creates disabilities for other churches, 138; its monopoly of the clergy reserves and its privileges challenged, 139-40, 143, 147, 153; rectories created for, 148-9, 153; it antagonizes Upper Canada, 161, 162; its influence in Nova Scotia, 172; Sydenham and, 190-1; its status under Act of Union, 198. See also Clergy Reserves, Constitutional Act.

ANGLO-JAPANESE TREATY, 353.

ANNAND, WILLIAM, (1808-92), opposed to federation in Nova Scotia, and defeated by Tupper (1867), 318.

ANNEXATION MOVEMENT, 259, 260 note 3, 261, 336.

Annexation, Preferential Trade, and

- Reciprocity*, by C. D. Allin and G. M. Jones, 260 note 3.
- ANSON, SIR WILLIAM, 521.
- ANTICOSTI, 33 note 5, 51.
- APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL, under the proclamation of 1763, 34; under the Constitutional Act, 82; attempts to limit in the dominion, 341, 397; present position of, 526-7; and Canadian 'New Deal', 545-54; in Ontario, 397, 398; criticism of, 398; and South Africa, 399; and Australia, 456. See also Tupper, C. H.; Raney, W. E.; Borden, Sir R.; St. Laurent, S.; Lapointe, Hon. E.
- APPEALS TO SUPREME COURT, 341, 395, 397.
- APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL OFFICERS, see Judicial Systems.
- ARCHIBALD, SIR ADAMS GEORGE, (1814-92), first lieutenant-governor of Manitoba, 329, 330 note 1.
- ARMY ACT, IMPERIAL, 355, 363.
- ARTHUR, SIR GEORGE, (1784-1854), lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada (1838-41), his important interview with Sydenham, 187 note 4.
- ASHBURTON TREATY (1842), 72, 221.
- ASSEMBLY, HOUSE OF, promised under proclamation of 1763, 33, 34; religious difficulties and, 35; references to in Murray's instructions, 36; and British merchants, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47; deemed inexpedient in Quebec Act, 51, 53; renewed demands for after 1783, 75; advocated in house of commons, 77; created in Maritime Provinces, 80; in Upper Canada and in Lower Canada, 81.
- ASSENT, withholding of, 82, 378, 379.
- ASSINIBOIA, DISTRICT OF, 323, 329, 330, note 1.
- ASSINIBOINE RIVER, Selkirk's settlement on, 323.
- ATKIN, LORD, RIGHT HON., 492, 493, 548, 549, 551.
- Attitude of Governor Seymour towards Confederation*, by F. W. Howay, 334 note 1.
- AURORA, ONTARIO, Edward Blake's speech at, 340.
- AUSTRIAN SOVEREIGNTY, see Sovereignty.
- AUSTRALIA, protests against lack of consultation, 352; and imperial conferences, ib., 359 note 1; its high court, 398, 405-6; its Royal Commissions Acts (1902-12), 409; and constitutional changes, 450; and residual powers, 455; and appeals, 456.
- AUSTRIA-HUNGARY, 432.
- AUTONOMY, development of Canadian, 339-76. See also Defence, Canada (Dominion of), Foreign Affairs, Governor-General, Militia, Treaties.
- AYLESWORTH, SIR ALLEN BRISTOL, (b. 1854), minister of justice (1906-11), 424, 426.
- AYLMER, MATTHEW WHITWORTH, BARON, (1775-1850), governor-in-chief of Canada (1831-5), his policy of conciliation, 106; receives address on grievances, ib.; attacked by Lower Canadian Assembly, 107-9; recalled, 110.
- AYLWIN, THOMAS CUSHING (1806-71), solicitor-general for Canada East, 224.
- BAGOT, SIR CHARLES, (1781-1843), governor-in-chief of Canada (1842-3), his estimate of Sydenham, 207-9; contrasted with Metcalfe, 210-14; character of his dispatches, 210; and Russell's dispatches, 212; his suspicions of Baldwin, ib.; warned by colonial office against the French-Canadians, ib.; his estimate of the Canadian situation, 213; his instructions, 214-15; ordered to be impartial and to avoid discussions on responsible government, 215-16; realizes collapse of Sydenham's system, 216; fears to meet the legislature, ib.; inherits Sydenham's quarrel with the French, 216-17; decides to postpone the summoning of the legislature, 217; improves judicial system of Canada East, ib.; makes changes in his council, ib.; fails to gain the political adherence of the French, 218; realizes the French-Canadian political power, ib.; his weak executive, ib.; is recommended to send for La Fontaine and Baldwin, ib.; his difficulties over Baldwin, 219; fears to change Sydenham's methods, but sees necessity of admitting the French, ib.; his dispatches astound the colonial office and are sent to Peel, 220; opens legislature, 221; approaches La Fontaine, 222; accepts Baldwin, 223; his new ministry sustained by the assembly,

- ib.*; announces his policy to the imperial government, 223-4; is attacked, 225; gains French-Canada, ib.; the reception of his proceedings in England, 226; his policy finally approved, 226-7; recognizes the virtual establishment of responsible government, 227; welcomes Metcalfe's appointment, 227-8; his death, 228; Metcalfe's estimate of his work, 230, 233, 239. See also Richardson, J.
- BALDWIN, ROBERT, (1804-58), his election to the assembly of Upper Canada, 141; his appointment to Bond Head's council, 151; his election address (1841), 188; appointed solicitor-general for Canada West, 199; desires homogeneous executive, 200; disappears from office under Sydenham's rebuke, ib.; moves for Russell's dispatches on responsible government, 202; proposes resolutions on responsible government, 202-3; his unpopularity with Bagot, 212, 219; Harrison recommends him to Bagot, 218; Draper's refusal to work with, 219; is accepted as minister by Bagot, 222-3; is appointed attorney-general for Canada West, 224; his estimate of Bagot's experiment, 225; his university bill, 242; differs with Metcalfe over patronage and resigns, 242-3; anticipates the difficulties of the 'double majority' principle, 247; his election address (1847), 255; is sent for by Elgin, ib.; and Rebellion Losses Bill, 258; regrets Russell's speech on colonial destiny, 261; his difficulties over the clergy reserves and seigniorial tenure, 262; his resignation, 263.
- BALDWIN, EARL (RT. HON. STANLEY BALDWIN), and abdication of Edward VIII, 555-7.
- BANNERMAN, SIR ALEXANDER, (1783-1865), lieutenant-governor of Prince Edward Island (1851-4), and responsible government, 268.
- BARRÉ, ISAAC, (1726-1802), and Quebec Act, 63.
- BÉDARD, ELZÉAR, (1799-1849), moves adoption of ninety-two resolutions, 107; deserts Papineau, 109.
- BÉDARD, PIERRE STANISLAS, (1762-1829), and Le Canadien, 94; dismissed from militia, 95; disagrees with Craig on constitutional issue, 96; arrested, ib.; raised to the bench, 99; his opinion of 'assemblies', 101.
- BELGIUM, treaty with, 347, 349.
- BELLEAU, SIR NARCISSE FORTUNAT, (1808-94), premier of the United Province of Canada, 310.
- BENNETT, RIGHT HON. R. B., 514, 516, 546.
- BERNARD, LIEUT.-COL. HEWITT (1825-93), his records of the Quebec conference, 301.
- BERNARD, THOMAS, author of An Appeal to the Public: Stating and Considering the Objections to the Quebec Act, 63 note 2.
- BERTHIER, parish of, 26.
- BIDWELL, BARNABAS, (b. 1763), associate of Gourelay, 131; returned to assembly and disqualified, 136; his defence before the legislature, 136 note 1.
- BIDWELL, MARSHALL SPRING, (1799-1872), in correspondence with Papineau, 111; reform member of assembly, 137, 139, 141; his misinterpretation of Head's actions, 151; Head's mistrust of, ib., 153.
- BILL OF RIGHTS (1 William and Mary, sess. 2, c. 2), 378; of New Hampshire, 454.
- BLACHFORD, FREDERIC ROGERS, BARON, (1811-89), permanent under-secretary of state for the colonies (1860-71), 314, 315 note 1, 316.
- BLAIR, ADAM JOHNSTON FERGUSSON, (1815-67), 310.
- BLAKE, EDWARD, (1833-1912), minister of justice (1875-7), supports 'Canada First' party, 340; his Aurora speech, ib.; and supreme court, 341; and power of pardon, 342; and governor-general's commission and instructions, ib.; and Canadian status, 342-4; and tariffs, 344; and power of disallowance, 420, 421, 423.
- BLANSHARD, RICHARD, (d. 1894), governor of Vancouver Island, 332.
- BOER WAR (1899-1902), 354.
- BONAR LAW, RT. HON. ANDREW, (b. 1858), and status of the dominions, 448.
- BORDEN, RT. HON. SIR ROBERT LAIRD, (1854-1937), his Constitutional Studies, 351 note 1, 363 note 1, 380 note 2; and Laurier's naval bill, 356; and defence, 356-8; present at imperial cabinet, 364; his speeches in England

- on foreign policy, ib., 366, 367; and war cabinet, 366; and ratification of treaties, 372; and League of Nations, 373; and dominion status, 375; and electoral ridings, 386; and appeals, 398, 526; and diplomacy, 508-9; and treaties, 510, 512.
- BOSTON MASSACRE (1770), and TEA PARTY (1773), 62.
- BOULTON, HENRY JOHN, (b. 1790), solicitor-general of Upper Canada, 129; his political incapacity as attorney-general, 144; his dismissal, 146; receives judicial appointment in Newfoundland, ib.
- BOUNDARIES, under proclamation of 1763, 33 note 5; under Quebec Act of 1774; 52 note 1; under Peace of 1783, 71-2; under Ashburton treaty of 1842, 72, 221; under Washington treaty of 1846, 249, 323, 331.
- BRIAND, JEAN OLIVIER, (1715-94), bishop of Quebec (1766-84), his consecration, 42.
- Brief Review of the Report of the . . . Assembly of Upper Canada on Lord Durham's Report*, by Francis Hincks, 168 note 2.
- BRIGHT, JOHN, (1811-89), and Canadian destiny, 316.
- BRITISH AMERICAN INDIANS, and the federal franchise, 388.
- BRITISH AMERICAN LAND COMPANY, the cancellation of its charter refused by Russell, 113.
- BRITISH COLUMBIA, and Washington treaty (1846), 331; its political beginnings, 332; its union with Vancouver Island, 333-4; and federation, 334-6; and franchise, 391; and divorce, 396; and disallowance, 416 note 1, 423, 425, 430 note 2.
- BRITISH COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS CONFERENCE AT TORONTO, 486.
- 'BRITISH DOMINIONS BEYOND THE SEAS', term of Canadian origin, 519-20.
- BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT OF 1867, drafts of, 314; passes imperial parliament, 315; expansion of, 378; definition of 'legislature' in, 392; the privy council's conception of, 405, 406, 407, 490-5, 552-4; the term 'federally united' in, 408-10; disallowance sections of, 416; the term 'similar in principle' in, 343, 428, 436; distribution of legislative power under, 433-44; observations on, 435-7; completeness of legislative power under, 440-1; dominion has no power to change, 450-1, 528-33, 554; in extenso, 459 ff.
- British North American League*, 1849, by C. D. Allin, 260 note 3.
- British Supremacy and Canadian Self-government, 1839-54*, by J. L. Morison, 199 note 3.
- BROCK, SIR ISAAC, (1769-1812), his anxiety over the alien question, 127.
- BROWN, GEORGE, (1818-80), and clergy reserves, 262; his request for dissolution refused, 270; his speech on the choice of the provincial capital, 272; his anti-papal views, 278; and 'representation by population', 279, 281, 295; and north-west, 285; forms ministry with Dorion, ib.; criticizes Macdonald-Cartier ministry and federation, 288-9; moves for committee to consider union, 293-4; suggests coalition, 294; negotiates with J. A. Macdonald, 294-7; and Charlotte-town conference, 299; and Quebec conference, 300-4; visits England in connexion with federation, 305; his speech on Quebec resolutions, 306-7; resigns from cabinet, 310; defeated in first federal elections, 318. See also Mackenzie, Alexander.
- BULLER, CHARLES, (1806-48), his Sketch of Lord Durham's Mission to Canada, 167, note 2.
- Bureaucracy Triumphant*, by C. K. Allen, 480 note 5.
- BURKE, EDMUND, (1729-97), and Quebec Act, 2, 3, 51, 63, 66; breaks friendship with Fox, 86.
- BURTON, SIR FRANCIS NATHANIEL, (1767-1832), administrator of Lower Canada (1824-5), makes constitutional error over finance, 104.
- BURTON, RALPH, appointed military lieutenant-governor of Quebec and governor of Three Rivers, 26; his instructions from Amherst, 27; succeeded by Haldimand, 28.
- Business of the Supreme Court, The*, by Professors Frankfurter and Landis, 530 note 5.
- BYNG, VISCOUNT, OF VIMY, and constitutional crises of 1926, 503, 505.
- CABINET SYSTEM IN THE DOMINION, its extra-constitutional conventions, 317-

- 18, 381, 413-14; its federal and provincial organization, 381-3; Dunkin's conception of, 307, 413.
- CARON, GUILLAUME DE AND EMERY DE, see Company of.
- CAHAN, HON. C. H., and Colonial Stock Act, 501-2; and Colonial Laws Validity Act, 516; and 'Canadian New Deal', 551.
- CAMERON, MALCOLM, (1808-76), enters Hincks-Morin ministry, 263.
- CAMPBELL, SIR ARCHIBALD, (1769-1843), lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick (1831-7), instructed to reform the councils, 170; carries on dispute with the assembly, ib.
- CAMPBELL, SIR COLIN, (1776-1847), lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia (1834-40), and Durham, 169; he retards reform, 196; his recall demanded, 197; his recall, ib., 206.
- CAMPBELL, SIR DONALD, (1800-50), lieutenant-governor of Prince Edward Island (1847-50), 268.
- Canada and the Canadian Question*, by Goldwin Smith, 412 note 1.
- CANADA COMMITTEE OF 1828, 105, 106, 140, 142, 169.
- CANADA COMPANY OF 1824, 139 note 3.
- CANADA CORN ACT OF 1843, 260.
- CANADA, DOMINION OF (1867-1922), discussion over title, 314-15, 518-20; created by proclamation, 316; first elections in, 318-19; its geographical expansion, 322-37; its associations with the west, 324; and Red River Rebellion, 328; receives power to create new provinces and to legislate for territories, 329; transference of Rupert's Land and North-West Territory to, 329; and negotiations with British Columbia, 334-6; development of autonomy in, 339-76; establishment of its Supreme Court, 341; Blake's influence on its status, 341-4; and trade treaties, 344-5, 347-50, 446, 451; its high commissioner, 345-6; and political treaties, 351-2, 446, 451, 510-13, 540-4; and foreign affairs, 353, 358, 364, 374, 445, 451, 452; and defence, 353-8; and title 'Imperial Conference', 358-9; its autonomy in Great War, 362-3; and Canadian ships in war, 363 note 1; its military forces in Great War, 363; and economic conference of 1916, 364; and war cabinet, 365-6, 452; and war conferences, 367-8; and channels of communication, 368, 380, 449; at peace conference, 370-2, 452; and League of Nations, 372-4, 452; its government, 378-99; the governor-general in, 378, 379-81, 449; legislative power in, 378, 433-44; the crown in, 379-80; executive cabinet government in, 381-3; parliament of, 383-6; electoral divisions in, 386; franchise in, 387-8; parliamentary procedure in, 389-90; privileges of its parliament, 392-3; its judicature, 393-5; divorce in, 396, 492; nature of its parliament, 406, 407, 412; of its senate, 412-13; and provincial Acts, 416-30, 497-500; general scheme of legislative power in, 437-9; its 'residuary' power, 439-40; completeness of legislative power in, 440-1; an integral part of the empire, 445, 447-9; its non-sovereign character, 446, 451-4; its present status, 447; possesses no powers of constitutional secession, 448-9, 515, 528-33; and imperial legislation, 449-50, 522-7; possesses no power to change the fundamental constitution, 450-1, 490-5, 552-4; its representative at Washington, 370, 452, 508-10; and problem of sovereignty, 454-7.
- House of Commons*: constitutional principle governing its membership, 303, 306, 385; shares with senate legislative power, 378, 383; regulations governing its electoral districts and franchise, 385-8; payment of its members, 386; its procedure, 389-90.
- Senate*: discussed at Quebec conference, 302, 304; discussed in federation debates, 306, 412-13; discussed at Westminster Palace Hotel conference, 313; the imperial government and its organization, 305, 313; its legislative powers, 378, 383, 385; and deadlock, 384, 384 note 2; represents grouped provinces, 384, 412, 414; qualifications for membership of, 384, 385; women and membership of, 384 note 1, 493-4; procedure in, 385; and divorce, 396, 492; and administrative law, 461-83; and Colonial Stock Acts, 501-2; and Commonwealth tribunal, 502-3; and 'Byng episode', 503, 505; and new position of governor-general, 503-8; and treaties, 510-13; and Statute of Westminster, 484, 495, 514-39, 560, 562; and British Commonwealth, 540-4; and 'new deal', 546-54; and abdication and coronation, 555-6.

See also Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan.

'CANADA FIRST' PARTY, 339-40.

CANADA, PROVINCE OF LOWER, (1791-1838), its creation, 81, 84; its system of government, 81-4; its first legislative assembly, 88; its early political parties, 94; its sources of revenue, 96; the growth of nationalism in, 98; its protests against 'gens en place', 99-100; projects to unite it with Upper Canada (1822), 103, 165, 400; rebellion in, 114-15; its constitution suspended, 115, 177; special council of, 115; its racial problem, 156-61; the crown's strategical position in, 162-3; the crown's lack of responsibility in, 163-4; influence of demagogues in, 165; value of Durham's Report on, 169; Durham dissolves its special council, 168; Durham's suggestions for, 173-5; its special council reassembled by Sydenham, 184; its special council accepts proposals for union, 185; its political apathy, ib.; its administrative chaos, 192; municipal government and registry offices organized in, 193-4.

House of Assembly, its early racial divisions, 89; its early regulations for its speaker and for language, 89-90; growth of French-Canadianism in, 91; Milnes's opinion of, 92; and 'Gaols' Bill', 93-4; and provincial press, 93; and exclusion of judges, 95, 160; its hatred of Craig, 95; it agrees (1810) to vote the civil expenses of the province, 96; Craig's estimate of, 97; its financial contests, 99-102; is under leadership of Papineau, 101, 104, 107; it claims complete financial control, 104, 106; it passes the ninety-two resolutions, 108; it impeaches Aylmer, ib.; grows more extreme, 110; its demands for an elective legislative council, 107, 108, 111; it hears Gosford's instructions, 112; its statement of claims before the rebellion, 112-13; and the ten resolutions, 114; its last meeting, ib.; an arena for French-Canadianism, 157; its racial challenges, 158-9; and impeachment, 159; motive behind its disputes with the legislative council and judiciary, 159-60; its claim to change the constitution, 163; its lack of executive control, 164.

Legislative Council: early anti-French influences in, 90; its financial disputes with the assembly, 101, 102, 111; its reformation recommended (1828), 105; demands to make it elective, 107, 108, 111, 112, 113, 159; its constitutional independence, 164.

Special Legislative Council: its creation, 115; its dissolution by Durham, 168; resummoned by Sydenham, 184; it accepts proposals for union, 185; it passes administrative ordinances, 193-4.

CANADA, PROVINCE OF UNITED (1841-67), created, 199; weakness of representative and responsible government in, 2; it erects tariff against Great Britain, 4; seigniorial tenure abolished in, 22, 264; its first assembly, 199-205; its eastern municipal institutions break down, 216; Bagot strengthens its judiciary, 217; Bagot recognizes the political power of the French in, 218-20; it suffers through the repeal of the corn laws, 260; seat of government question in, 272; growing desire for wider government in, 273; the tariff question in, 274-6; and defence, 276-8, 291-3; political stagnation in, 278-82, 283, 292-3; federation idea grows in, 281-93; the union of Macdonald and Brown in, 294-7; delegates at Charlottetown, 299-300; its delegates at Quebec conference, 300-4; its delegates in England, 313-15.

House of Assembly: under Act of Union, 198; the first, 199; Sydenham's methods with, 200-2; Sydenham loses hold on, 207, 208, 209; it sustains Bagot's La Fontaine-Baldwin ministry, 223; and Metcalfe, 241-2, 246-7; passes Rebellion Losses Bill, 257; passes Canadian Reform Bill, 263; passes seigniorial tenures bill and secularization of clergy reserves bill, 264; rejects militia bill, 277; its political weakness, 278-82.

Legislative Council under Act of Union, 198; made elective, 263, 264.

CANADA, PROVINCE OF UPPER, (1791-1841), its creation, 81, 84; its system of government, 81-4; its clergy reserves, 82, 120, 130, 131, 139-40, 141, 147, 149, 150, 190-1; projects to unite it with Lower Canada (1822), 103, 165, 400; its organization by Simcoe, 117-19; its racial backgrounds, 119; its early reformers, 120-6; and war of 1812, 127-8; its alien question, 127-8, 137-8; its land problem, ib.; its physical background, 130-1; its slow development, 131; and religious questions, 141, 149; and 'loyalty', 136, 152; reports on state of, 154-5; the causes for constitutional failure in, 161-2; the strength of the crown in, 162-5; Durham's Report on, 168; Sydenham meets its legislature, 186; its last legislature, 191; its reaction to Sydenham's methods, 194-6.

House of Assembly: Simcoe's criticism of, 117, 119; and early reformers, 121-6; it opposes martial law, 127; refuses to tax waste lands, 128, 129; is jealous of its rights and privileges, 129; its attitude towards Americans, 132; it passes bill against unlawful meetings, 134; is dissatisfied over alien question, 137-8; its dealings with the clergy reserves, 139-40, 149, 190; its reformers and Colborne, 141, 142, 143; its powerlessness against the legislative council, 143-4; and W. L. Mackenzie, 144-5; attacks colonial secretary, 146; under Mackenzie's leadership, 147; its reports on the state of the province, 154; it possesses no control over the executive, 164; it lays down conditions for union unacceptable to Great Britain, 182; its dissolution advised if necessary to force union, 183; is addressed by Sydenham, 186; Sydenham's estimate of, 186-7; it accepts proposals for union, 187; its last meeting, 191.

Legislative Council: Simcoe's ideas of, 117; it pleases Simcoe, 119; is in control of the 'family compact', 129; it carries on dispute with the assembly over privileges, ib.; and marriage, 138; imperial promises to reform, 142; its composition criticized by Colborne, 142-3; its strength against reforms, 143; proposals to make it elective, 148, 152; it draws up a report on the state of the province, 154; its constitutional independence, 164; it accepts proposals for union, 187; and clergy reserves, 190; its last meeting, 191.

CANADA REFORM BILL, passed by Hincks-Morin ministry, 263.

Canada's Federal System, by A. H. F. Lefroy, 415 note 4.

Canada since the Union of 1841, by J. C. Dent, 243 note 2.

CANADA TRADE ACT (3 George IV, c. 119), 103.

Canada versus Guadeloupe, by W. L. Grant, 32 note 1.

Canadian Constitution historically explained, by W. Scott, 432 note 1.

Canadian Constitutional Law, by A. H. F. Lefroy, 424 note 2, 427 note 2.

Canadian Constitutional Studies, by R. L. Borden, 351 note 1, 363 note 1, 380 note 2.

CANADIAN NATIONAL ASSOCIATION, its political programme, 339-40.

'CANADIAN NATIONALS', defined, 373 note 1, 484-5.

CANADIAN 'NEW DEAL', 545-54.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY, 337.

CANADIAN STANDARD, carried at the Coronation, 564.

CANNING, GEORGE. (1770-1827), friend of Bagot's, 211.

CAPE BRETON ISLAND, 25 note 1.

CARIGNAN-SALIÈRES, REGIMENT OF, 19.

CARLETON, SIR GUY, see Dorchester, Baron.

CARNARVON, HENRY HOWARD MOLY-NEUX HERBERT, FOURTH EARL OF, (1831-90), colonial secretary (1866-7), 314, 315, 489-93.

CARON, RENÉ ÉDOUARD, (1800-76), refuses to enter Draper's ministry, 247. See also Correspondence between, &c.

CARR, C. T., 461 note 2, 469 note 1.

CARTIER, SIR GEORGE ÉTIENNE, BART., (1814-73), forms ministry with J. A. Macdonald, 264; adheres to Act of Union, 281; forms ministry on Galt's refusal, 286; accepts federation as a government measure, 286; his mission to England in support of federation, 286-8; and federation dispatches to other provinces, 289; and Macdonald-Brown negotiations, 295; at Charlottetown conference, 299; at Quebec conference, 300; and Quebec resolutions, 306; visits England over federation

- proposals, 309; supports federation movement in Halifax, 319; goes to England in connexion with Hudson's Bay Co., 326; and disallowance of provincial Acts, 416, 429.
- CARTIER, JACQUES, (1491-1557), 7, 15, 322.
- CARTWRIGHT, J. S., (1804-45), refuses to join Bagot's council, 217; his attitude towards the French-Canadians, ib.
- CATALOGNE, GÉDÉON DE, (1662-1729), his report on the seigniories, 19.
- CATHCART, CHARLES MURRAY, EARL, (1783-1859), governor of Canada (1846-7), 249.
- Cavendish's Debates ... on the Bill ... for the Government of Quebec* (ed. J. Wright), 50 note 1, 51 note 2, 54 note 4, 55 note 1, 62 note 4, 65 note 1.
- CHAMBERLAIN, RT. HON. JOSEPH, (1836-1914), colonial secretary (1895-1903), his dispatch on disallowance, 422-3; and immigration, 434; and royal titles, 518-19.
- CHAMPLAIN, SAMUEL, (1567-1635), 322.
- CHANNEL OF COMMUNICATION BETWEEN IMPERIAL AND DOMINION GOVERNMENTS, 368, 380, 449.
- CHAPAIS, THOMAS, (b. 1858), his Les débuts du Régime parlementaire, 89 note 2.
- CHARLOTTETOWN, (founded 1768), conference at (1864), 299-300.
- CHARWOOD, GODFREY RATHBONE BENSON, FIRST BARON, (b. 1864), his Life of Lincoln, 291 note 2.
- CHASTES, AYMAR DE, see Company of.
- CHATHAM, WILLIAM PITT, FIRST EARL OF, (1708-78), and Seven Years War, 23; attacks policy of the Quebec Act, 64, 66.
- CHAUVIN, PIERRE, SIEUR DE TONTUIT, see Company of.
- CHOISEUL, ÉTIENNE FRANÇOIS, DUC DE, (1719-85), and retention of Canada, 31.
- CHURCHILL, RT. HON. WINSTON LEONARD SPENCER, (b. 1874), his denial of the 'right' of secession, 448.
- CIVIL LIST, dispute over in Lower Canada, 101, 102, 106, 107, 110, 160.
- CLARENDON, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK VILLIERS, FOURTH EARL OF, (1800-70), friend of Bagot's, 210.
- CLARK, J. MURRAY, on security of property in Canada, 416 note 2.
- CLARKE, SIR ALURED, (1745-1832), lieutenant-governor of Lower Canada (1791-6), inaugurates Constitutional Act, 84; divides Lower Canada into electoral districts and arranges representation, 84, 88; on Lower Canadian racialism, 90.
- 'CLEAR GRITS', in Canada West, 263, 264, 278.
- CLEMENT, W. H. P., 432; his Law of the Canadian Constitution, 432 note 2.
- CLERGY RESERVES, created under the Constitutional Act, 82; their economic and social aspects, 120, 130, 131, 147; their political aspect, 139, 140, 141; imperial attitude towards, 142, 149, 150; Sydenham's dealing with, 190-1; and Baldwin-La Fontaine ministry, 262; and Hincks-Morin ministry, 263; their secularization, 4, 140, 264.
- COBBETT, WILLIAM, (1762-1835), his followers arrive in Upper Canada, 128; Maitland likens Gourlay to, 133.
- COLBERT, JEAN BAPTISTE, (1619-83), minister of marine and colonies (1669-83), his influence on colonization, 11; he organizes company of West Indies, ib.; forbids summoning of estates-general of New France, 16.
- COLBORNE, SIR JOHN, FIRST BARON SEATON, (1778-1863), lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada (1828-35), establishes special council in Lower Canada, 115; succeeds Maitland, 141; his instructions, 142; sees the difficulties created by the 'family compact' and the Anglican Church, 142-3; his estimate of Bishop Strachan, 143; hesitates to make public imperial dispatches, 145; his censure and recall, 148; establishes crown rectories, 148-9; his special council re-summoned by Sydenham, 184.
- COLEBROOKE, SIR WILLIAM MACBEAN GEORGE, (1787-1870), lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick (1841-8), 267.
- COLES, GEORGE, (1810-75), reform leader in Prince Edward Island, 268.
- COLONIAL ADVOCATE, THE (founded at Queenston May 18, 1824, and transferred to Toronto November 1824), 140, 144, 147 note 1.
- COLONIAL CONFERENCES, 347, 349, 358-9.
- COLONIAL LAWS VALIDITY ACT, 515, 516, 522-7.

- Colonial Policy of Lord John Russell*, by Earl Grey, 253 note 4.
- COLONIAL STOCK ACT, 1934, 502.
- COMMERCIAL TREATIES, see Canada, Dominion of and Treaties.
- COMMITTEE OF CORRESPONDENCE, 62.
- COMMITTEE OF IMPERIAL DEFENCE, 353, 356-7, 453. See also Esher, Viscount.
- COMMONS, HOUSE OF, see Canada, Dominion of.
- COMMONWEALTH TRIBUNAL, 502-3.
- COMMUNICATION, CHANNEL OF, WITH IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT, see Channel.
- COMPANY OF CHAUVIN (1599), 8 note 3; of De Caën (1620), 8 note 3; of De Chastes (1602), 8 note 3; of De Monts (1603), 8 note 3; of Montmorency (1622), 8 note 3; of New France (Compagnie des Cent-Associés, 1627), 7, 9, 10, 11, 12; of Pont-Gravé (1599), 8 note 3; of Rouen (1613), 8 note 3; of the West Indies (1664), 7, 11. See also Hudson's Bay, North-West Company, X. Y. Company.
- CONCORDAT, THE (1801), its influence in Lower Canada, 97.
- CONFEDERATION, discussion of the term, 400-11; of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Plymouth, and New Haven (1643), 401; 'Articles of' (1778), 401-2; of Southern States, 403.
- CONFERENCE, see Colonial Conferences, Dominion-Provincial Conferences, and Imperial Conference.
- CONSTITUTION, alteration of, see Alteration.
- Constitution of Canada*, by W. R. Riddell, 427 note 4, 428 note 2, 430 note 3.
- CONSTITUTIONAL ACT OF 1791 (31 George III, c. 31), gives the Canadas representative institutions, 2; its drafts, 78-9; passed, 80; analysis of, 81-4; and 'clergy reserves' and 'protestant clergy', 82, 130, 131, 139, 140, 149, 150, 153, 190, 262, 264; brought into force, 84; debates in the imperial parliament, 84-6; Pitt's conception of, 85-6; its political purpose, 157; creates constitutional difficulties, 162-4, 279, 280-2.
- CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, FIRST (1774), 63.
- CONVENTION, THE FEDERAL (1787), 402, 414.
- COOLEY, THOMAS M., quoted, 403.
- CORN LAWS, BRITISH, effect of abolition in Canada, 260.
- CORNWALLIS, CHARLES, FIRST MARQUIS AND SECOND EARL CORNWALLIS (1738-1805), surrenders at Yorktown (1781), 56.
- CORONATION OF GEORGE VI, 564-6.
- Correspondence between . . . W. H. Draper . . . R. E. Caron and . . . R. E. Caron and . . . L. H. La Fontaine and A. N. Morin*, 247 note 1.
- COUNCIL OF FOUR, at Peace Conference 1919, 371.
- COUNCIL OF TEN, at Peace Conference 1919, 370.
- COURTS, see Judicial Systems.
- Coutume de Paris*, 54, 54 note 3.
- COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, see League of Nations.
- CRAIG, SIR JAMES HENRY, (1748-1812), governor of Canada (1807-11), his arrival, 94; dismisses militia officers, 95; his analysis of political tendencies, ib.; his financial conflict with the assembly, 96; and Le Canadien, ib.; criticism of his régime, 96-7, 157-8; and Act of Supremacy, 103.
- CRAMAHÉ, HECTOR THEOPHILUS, (d. 1789), 47, 58.
- CRIMINAL APPEALS: to supreme court, 395; to privy council, 397, 398, 524-7.
- CROMWELL, OLIVER, (1599-1658), 165.
- CROWN, THE, in the Canadas, 162-6; in the dominion, 379-81.
- Custom of Paris in the New World*, The, by W. B. Munro, 54 note 3.
- CUVILLIER, AUGUSTIN, (d. 1849), withdraws from Papineau's group, 109.
- DALHOUSIE, GEORGE RAMSAY, NINTH EARL OF, (1770-1838), governor of Canada (1820-8), his instructions, 102; his conflicts with the assembly of Lower Canada, ib., 104; attacked by Papineau, 105; removed to India, ib.
- DALY, SIR DOMINICK, (1798-1868), member of Durham's special council, 168; member of Metcalfe's provisional government, 242, 244; forms ministry with Sherwood, 247, 254.
- DAVIDSON, JOHN, crown lands' commissioner, retirement of under Bagot, 222, 223.
- DAVIN, NICHOLAS FLOOD, (1843-1901), his The Irishman in Canada, 217 note 4.
- DEADLOCK, in federal area, 305, 384; in provinces of Nova Scotia and Quebec, 390.

- DECLARATION OF LONDON, 352.
- DEFENCE, in province of United Canada, 276-8, 291-2; its ambiguous position after federation, 340; and imperial parliament, 353; dominion control over, ib.; minister of, ib.; gradually assumed by the dominion, 354-8; and empire, 360, 362-3, 364, 374.
- Delegated Legislation*, by C. T. Carr, 461 note 2, 469 note 1.
- DELEGATION, DOCTRINE OF, 402, 406, 407, 410, 412, 430.
- DENT, JOHN CHARLES, (1841-88), his Canada since the Union of 1841, 243 note 2.
- DERBY, EDWARD GEORGE GEOFFREY SMITH STANLEY, FOURTEENTH EARL OF, (1799-1869), secretary for war and the colonies (1833-4, 1841-5), appoints select committee to investigate the Canada question, 109; reinstates Hagerman, 146; receives Bagot's estimate of Sydenham, 207; issues Bagot's instructions, 214-15; his reactionary tendencies, 214; advises Bagot to avoid distinctions of race, creed, or party, 215; receives advice from MacNab, 220; his panic over Bagot's dispatches, 220-1; advises Bagot to multiply 'vendus', 221; instructs Bagot only to approach the French party as a desperate measure, ib.; is startled at Bagot's constitutional experiment, 225; his approval of Bagot's policy, 226-7; his defence of Metcalfe, 245; is recommended to send Elgin to the Canadas, 249.
- DERBY, EDWARD HENRY STANLEY, FIFTEENTH EARL OF, (1826-93), foreign secretary (1866-8), objects to title 'kingdom of Canada', 315.
- DICEY, A. V., (1835-1922), and Canadian federalism, 428; his Law of the Constitution, 428 note 4.
- DISALLOWANCE OF DOMINION ACTS, 379, 500-1; of provincial acts, 82, 303, 415-30, 497-500.
- DISMISSAL OF MINISTERS, 382.
- DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT, 82, 164, 383.
- DIVORCE, 395-7, 492.
- DIXON, THE HON. MR. JUSTICE, 521.
- Documents relating to the Seigneurial Tenure*, ed. W. B. Munro, 19 note 1.
- DOHERTY, RT. HON. CHARLES JOSEPH, minister of justice (1911-21), and defence, 361; and peace treaties, 371; his theory of statehood, 374-5; and disallowance of provincial acts, 421, 425-6, 427, 428, 429.
- 'DOMINION', origin of the title, 315 note 3.
- DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES, of 1927, 515; of 1931, 516.
- DORCHESTER, SIR GUY CARLETON, FIRST BARON, (1724-1808), governor of Canada (1768-78, 1786-96), early advocate of conciliation, 41-2; succeeds Murray, 44; opposed to an assembly in Quebec, 45; his ideas on a legal system for Quebec, 46; behind the scenes in the drafting of the Quebec Act, 47, 48, 50, 54, 62, 65; corrects some judicial abuses, 48; creates a 'privy council', 53; his dispute with Livius, ib., 56; examined at bar of house of commons, 54; his instructions under the Quebec Act, 55; his ambiguous administrative course, ib., 56, 65, 156-7; summons first council under the Quebec Act, 56; refuses to communicate his instructions, ib.; his instructions and the religious problem, 57; his military training and the problem of government, 59; his dispatches and the problem of government, 59-62; his criticism of the proclamation of 1763, 60; the imperial government and his dispatches, ib.; his faith that concessions will hold the French, ib.; his influence in England on the eve of the Quebec Act, 61-2; his misinterpretation of Canadian sentiment, 67; his disappointment in the results of the Quebec Act, 68; his administration under the Quebec Act, 72; sets up judicial system, 72-3; finds new political situation after the revolutionary war, 75; inquires into the state of the province, 76; takes division of province into consideration, 77; his opinions on division, 78; receives draft of Constitutional Act, ib.; suggests a kind of British American federation, 79; his opinions on a colonial aristocracy, ib.; appointed governor-in-chief of the Canadas, 84; organizes judicature in Lower Canada, 90; dislikes the Constitutional Act, 91; his dispute with Simcoe, ib., 119.
- DORION, SIR ANTOINE ARMÉ, (1818-91), minister of justice (1873-4), forms

- ministry with Brown, 285; attacks Quebec resolutions, 307, 404, 413, 414; and disallowance of a Manitoba Act, 418.
- 'DOUBLE MAJORITY' principle, 247, 281, 282. Cf. 316 note 2.
- DOUGHTY, ARTHUR GEORGE, (b. 1860), editor of Knox's Journal, 26 note 1.
- DOUGLAS, SIR JAMES, (1803-77), governor of Vancouver Island (1851-63), governor of British Columbia (1858-64), 332, 333, 334.
- DOUTRE, G., joint author of Le Droit Civil Canadien, 28 notes 1 and 2, 42 note 3.
- DRAPER, WILLIAM HENRY, (1801-77), attorney-general of Canada West, 199; discusses political situation with Bagot, 218; advises Bagot to open negotiations with the French, 219; refuses to work with Baldwin, ib.; his resignation, 223; joins Metcalfe's executive, 244; fails to secure La Fontaine's help, 247; reference to one of his judicial opinions, 417. See also Correspondence between, &c.
- Droit de Banalité during the French Régime*, by W. B. Munro, 20 note 3.
- DUFFERIN AND AVA, FREDERICK TEMPLE HAMILTON BLACKWOOD, MARQUESS OF, (1826-1902), governor-general of Canada (1872-8), his exercise of the power of pardon, 342; his indiscretion in asking J. A. Macdonald to resign, 382 note 1.
- DUNDONALD, DOUGLAS MACKINNON BAILLIE HAMILTON - COCHRANE, TWELFTH EARL OF, (b. 1852), in command of the federal militia (1902-4), his dismissal from the command of the Canadian militia and its causes, 354.
- DUNKIN, CHRISTOPHER, (1811-81), his criticism of the Quebec Resolutions, 307, 317, 413, 429.
- DURHAM, JOHN GEORGE LAMTON, FIRST EARL OF, (1792-1840), governor of Canada (May 29-November 1, 1838), his appointment, 115; his criticism of the clergy reserves, 140; his criticism of colonial representative government, 165; the scope of his authority, 167; his preconceived favour for federation, ib.; his first proclamation, 167-8; his imperialism, 168; he dissolves the old council, ib.; his Report, 168-9, 521; his resignation, 169; meets representatives from the Maritime Provinces, ib.; abandons the idea of an immediate federation, 173; advises reunion of the Canadas under responsible government, 173-4; his fundamental principles governing this advice, 174; his anglicizing policy, 174-5, 219; his conception of responsible government, 175-6; his conception of a federated British North America, 176; recommends thorough municipal system, ib., 193 note 3; attempts to distinguish imperial and colonial subjects, 177-8; his Report before the house of commons, 179; is Elgin's father-in-law, 249; his conception of a federation, 400-1. See also Buller, C., and Durham's Report.
- Durham's Report*, on clergy reserves, 140; on the failure of representative government, 165; its anglicizing policy, 174-5, 219; on responsible government, 175-6, 239; on federation, 174, 175; on municipal institutions, 176; on distinction between local and imperial affairs, 177-8.
- EASTERN TOWNSHIPS, 88, 103, 106.
- ECONOMIC CONFERENCE OF 1916, 364.
- EDUCATION, and Galt, 312, 313, 314; regulations for its control in Manitoba, 329; special provisions for its control in the Yukon, 331; its constitutional place in the federation, 433-4, 437.
- EDWARD VIII, abdication of, 555-66.
- Eight Years in Canada, embracing a Review of the Administration . . . of Sir Charles Bagot*, by J. Richardson, 228 note 3.
- Église du Canada après la Conquête, L'*, by l'abbé A. Gosselin, 42 note 4.
- ELECTORAL DIVISIONS, determined by the federal parliament, 386.
- ELGIN, JAMES BRUCE, EIGHTH EARL OF, (1811-63), governor of Canada (1847-54), appointed by Whig ministry, 249; an eminent Peelite, ib.; Durham's son-in-law, ib.; his influence on Earl Grey's policy, 253; arrives in Canada, ib.; his problems, 253-4; his conception of the office of governor, 254, 255 note 1, 256, 257, 270; sends for La Fontaine and Baldwin, 255; and French-Canadian problem, 257; and French language, ib.; and the political outlook of Canada East, ib.; and

- Rebellion Losses Bill, 257-60; insulted at Montreal, 258; vindicates responsible government, 259; and repeal of the Corn Laws, 260; and reciprocity, 4, 261, 290, 344, 351; rebukes Russell, 261; his imperial conception, 261-2; and clergy reserves, 262; defended by Howe, 266. 'EMPIRE TREATIES', 547-8, 552.
- Épisode de l'histoire de la Dîme au Canada*, by l'abbé A. Gosselin, 40 note 2.
- ESHER, VISCOUNT, his Committee of Imperial Defence, 357 note 1.
- ESQUIMALT, 354, 355.
- ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY, 425 note 1.
- Essays in Constitutional Law*, by W. P. N. Kennedy, 488 note 2, 495 note 1, 565 note 1.
- EVATT, THE HON. MR. JUSTICE, 505, 521. Evolution of the Dominion of Canada, by E. Porritt, 414 note 1.
- EXCHEQUER, COURT OF, 394-5.
- Extra Official State Papers*, by William Knox, 64 note 1, 78 note 2.
- EXTRATERRITORIALITY, 522-7.
- FALKLAND, LUCIUS BENTINCK CARY, TENTH VISCOUNT, (1803-4), lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia (1840-6), succeeds Campbell, 197; driven from office, 265.
- 'FAMILY COMPACT', its general character, 120; in control of the councils, 129; and Gourlay, 131, 132, 135, 136; and Mackenzie's printing-press, 140; and Mackenzie affair, 145-6; attacked in Seventh Report on Grievances, 147; its apparent triumph, 152-3, 154; its intellectual vigour, 155; its exclusiveness, 161; favoured by the constitution, 164; attacks Durham's Report, 168; neglected by Sydenham, 187; favoured by Stanley, 214; its ambiguous policy, 216; its claims advocated in England by MacNab, 220; favoured by Metcalfe, 232, 235, 241; and Elgin, 259.
- FEDERALISM, the nature of Canadian, 400-32, 554.
- FEDERATION, influenced by deadlock and party failure, 280-2; its various obstacles, 283-4; Galt's proposals for, 284-5; made a government measure, 286; supported by Canadian mission to England (1858), ib.; its difficulties discussed in England, 286-8; gathers strength against opposition, 289; rejected by the Reform Convention (1859), ib.; J. A. Macdonald favours wider scheme, ib.; Macdonald's conception of, 289-90, 488-95; McGee supports, 289, 290; is influenced by American tariffs and the Civil War, 290-2; gains ground in the Maritime Provinces, 292; is supported by Brown, 293; and the Macdonald-Brown negotiations, 294-7; its progress at Charlottetown and Quebec Conferences, 298-304; is welcomed in England, 305; is accepted by the Canadian legislature, 308; is opposed in the Maritime Provinces, 308-9; it gains strength, 311-12; at Westminster Palace Hotel Conference, 313-15; in the imperial parliament, 315; English indifference to, 315-16; accepted at dominion elections, 318; is opposed in Nova Scotia, 319-20; faith in its wider possibilities, 322; and the west, 323-36; and Prince Edward Island, 336-7; its loose definitions, 403-4.
- FENIANISM, and federation of New Brunswick, 311.
- FERGUSON, HON. H. G., 515.
- FERNEY, 31.
- FEUDALISM, see Seigniorial System.
- FIELDING, HON. WILLIAM STEVENS, (b. 1848), minister of finance (1896-1911, 1921), and peace treaties, 374.
- FINLAY, HUGH, (d. 1801), deputy-postmaster for Canada, his view of colonial possessions, 4; his opposition to Haldimand, 74.
- FIRTH, WILLIAM, attorney-general of Upper Canada, attacks Gore, 126.
- FITZPATRICK, SIR CHARLES, (b. 1853), minister of justice (1902-6), 424.
- FITZROY, SIR CHARLES AUGUSTUS, (1796-1858), lieutenant-governor of Prince Edward Island (1837-41), and Durham, 169; and reforms, 172-3.
- FLAG, no recognized national, 564.
- FLORIDAS, THE, their civil government, 32.
- FOLEY, MICHAEL HAMILTON, passed over by Sir E. Head, 270.
- FOREIGN AFFAIRS, Durham and, 178, 203, 252; Howe and, 181, 203, 252; and office of high commissioner, 345-6; their relation to commercial treaties, 347-9; and political treaties, 351-2;

- Laurier and, 352-3; and imperial defence committee, 353, 356-7, 453; and Canada (1867-1914), 360-1, 364, 365, 367, 374; and the imperial tie, 445-58, 510-13, 540-4.
- FORT GARRY (founded about 1862) and incorporated as Winnipeg 1873), 324, 327, 328.
- FOSTER, RT. HON. SIR GEORGE EULAS, (b. 1847), 364, 371.
- FOSTER, WILLIAM A., and 'Canada First' party, 339.
- FOURNIER, HON. TÉLESPHORE, (1824-96), minister of justice (1874-5), 418.
- Fourth Earl of Carnarvon, The*, by Sir H. Hardinge, 490 note 1.
- FOX, CHARLES JAMES (1749-1806), and Quebec Act, 3, 66; breaks friendship with Burke, 86.
- FOY, JAMES JOSEPH (1847-1916), attorney-general of Ontario, 397.
- FRANCE, ITS EARLY COLONIAL POLICY, 7-24; its American possessions pass to Britain, 25, 32; its alliance with the United States, 69; its influence on Constitutional Act, 79, 86; its propaganda in Lower Canada, 90, 97; and trade treaties, 344, 347, 348; and Canada's place at the peace conference, 371.
- FRANCHISE, under Constitutional Act, 81; in the dominion, 387-8; in the provinces, 391.
- FRANKFURTER, PROFESSOR F., 482, 530.
- FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN, (1706-90), his plan for the union of the American colonies, 401.
- FRASER RIVER, 332.
- FREEMASONS, exempted from classification as an illegal society under Secret Societies Bill, 241.
- FRENCH-CANADIANS,
In New France: their political apathy, 1, 2, 22, 23, 49; their government under the French régime, 7-17; and the seigniorial system, 19-24.
 1759-74: under the 'régime militaire', 25-31; and grant of religious toleration, 3, 30, 35, 39, 40, 41, 42; problem of their civil government, 34-5, 37, 48-9; Murray's goodwill towards, 38, 41-2, 58; early signs of their repression, 39-41; Carleton's goodwill towards, 41, 58, 60; gradual concessions to, 42; and problem of an assembly, 44-5, 60; in relation to the penal laws, 46; their petitions on the administrative scheme, 47; generously treated by the Quebec Act, 51, 57, 58, 64; and privileges granted by Quebec Act, 67; their apathy during American revolution, 67-8; consolidated by the Quebec Act, 69, 156-7, 279; attached to imperial connexion, 70.
 1774-91: and newer problem of assembly, 75; fear revocation of Quebec Act, ib.; the state of France works in their favour, 79; their privileges under the Constitutional Act, 82, 83; Pitt's conception of their future, 84-6, 157, 279.
 1791-1838: their ignorance of representative institutions, 89; their early racial and linguistic grouping, 89-90; and Le Canadien, 94; beginnings of their political grouping, 95; their consolidation under Craig's régime, 95-7; their alienation from the British, 98; early conciliation towards, 99; and 'gens en place', ib., 100; continued conciliation towards, 100-2; and proposal for union (1822), 103, 165, 400; their response to Papineau, 105, 110, 111, 114, 115; their privileges confirmed by Canada Committee (1828), 105; their ranks broken into 'patriotes' and 'constitutionalists', 109; their racial consolidation, 156-61.
 1838-1922: their absorption contemplated by Durham, 174-5, 219; are considered unfit for self-government by Sydenham, 185, 194; Sydenham notes their racial cohesion, 185, 193; Sydenham's early desires to work with, 193; they hold aloof from Sydenham's activities, 194; their language and the Act of Union, 198; wisdom of Sydenham's attitude towards their political grouping (1841), 205-6; their racialism inactive under Sydenham, 207; Bagot censures Sydenham's attitude towards them, 207-8, 216, 217; are recommended to Bagot, 210; colonial office warns Bagot against them, 212; they refuse to work municipal machinery, 216; their political importance recognized by Cartwright, Draper, and Harrison, 217-19; individual defections fail to break their solidarity, 218; Bagot recognizes that he cannot govern the province without

- them, 219; Stanley's opposition to, 220-1; Bagot accepts them as a political party, 222; conciliated by Bagot's measures, 223-4; their sorrow over Bagot's illness, 228; Metcalfe alienates, 246-7; and Elgin, 257, 258, 259, 279; their natural conservatism, 263; their consolidation under the Act of Union, 279-81; Brown's conception of their strength, 306-7; Cartier's conception of their future, 306; and federal proposals in matters of education, 313-14; their special claims to cabinet representation, 317, 381; and divorce, 396-7; and constitutional changes, 450.
- FRENCH LANGUAGE, 89, 90, 94, 103, 157, 198, 257, 389.
- FRENCH REVOLUTION, attitude of Canadians during, 69.
- FRONTENAC, LOUIS DE BUADE, COMTE DE PALLUAU ET DE, (1620-98), governor of New France (1672-82, 1689-98), 14; summons the three estates, 16.
- GAGE, THOMAS, (1721-87), governor at Montreal, 26; receives instructions from Amherst, 27; his report on the 'régime militaire', 28-9.
- GALT, SIR ALEXANDER TILLOCH, (1817-93), minister of finance (1858-62, 1864-6, 1867), claims fiscal autonomy, 273-6; his federal proposals (1858), 284-5, 287, 293; visits England in the matter of federation, 286, 293; grasps relation between federation and transportation, 287-8; takes part in Macdonald-Brown negotiations, 294-5; at Charlottetown and Quebec conferences, 299, 300; defends Quebec resolutions, 306; visits England in connexion with Quebec resolutions, 309; retires over educational problem, 312; and educational proposals at Westminster Palace Hotel conference, 313-14; and English apathy, 315-16; joins first federal cabinet, 317-18; and 'better terms', 320; and railways, 344; appointed high commissioner, 346; his speech on the imperial problem, ib.; his Relations of the Colonies to the Empire, 346 note 2. See also Skelton, O. D.
- GALT, JOHN, (1779-1839), his transactions over 'clergy reserves' and his Life, by R. K. Gordon, 139 note 3.
- 'GAOLS' BILL', helps to create racial issue, 93, 94.
- GARNEAU, FRANÇOIS XAVIER, (1809-66), his estimate of the 'régime militaire', 28; his Histoire referred to, 31 note 1.
- GEORGE III, (1738-1820), Burke's conception of his sovereignty over New France, 2, 51; the question of tithes left to his pleasure, 40; approves Carleton's proposals, 60; his message to parliament in connexion with the Quebec Act, 63; the 'patriot king', 66; his example recommended to Bagot by Peel, 220.
- GEORGE VI, coronation of, 564-6.
- GERMANY, difficulties created by trade treaty with, 347, 349; Canada at war with, 362; Canada and peace treaty with, 370-2.
- GIPPS, SIR GEORGE, (1791-1847), member of the Canada commission (1835), 110.
- GIROUARD, JOHN JOSEPH, (1795-1855), unable to accept office under Bagot, 224-5.
- GLADSTONE, RT. HON. WILLIAM EWART, (1809-98), secretary for war and the colonies (1845-6), and Rebellion Losses Bill, 259; and the retention of Canada, 316.
- GLENELG, CHARLES GRANT, BARON, (1778-1866), secretary for war and the colonies (1835-9), issues Gosford's instructions, 110; receives Seventh Report on Grievances, 148; appoints Bond Head, 148, 150; issues Bond Head's instructions, 150; his conceptions of responsible government, 150-1, 172, 196; refuses to urge repeal of the Revenue Control Act, 152; his dispatch on the reform of the executive, ib.; mistrusts and recalls Head, 153; his instructions, &c., to Durham, 167; and reforms in Nova Scotia, 171-2.
- Globe, The*, (established by George Brown at Toronto, 1844), 262, 297.
- GODERICH, FREDERICK JOHN ROBINSON, VISCOUNT, AFTERWARDS EARL OF RIPON, (1782-1859), secretary for war and the colonies (1827, 1830-3), interviews W. L. Mackenzie, 145, 146, 147; orders Colborne to publish dispatch on grievances, 145; censures Hagerman and Boulton, 146; and clergy reserves, 149; and the councils in Nova Scotia, 169-70.

- GORDON, SIR ARTHUR HAMILTON, BARON STANMORE, (b. 1829), lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick (1861-6), and federation, 300, 309, 311.
- GORDON, R. K., author of John Galt, 139 note 3.
- GORE, DISTRICT OF, Metcalfe's reply to an address from, 245.
- GORE, SIR FRANCIS, (1769-1832?), lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada (1806-18), his dispute with Thorpe, 122-4; his political methods, 124, 126, 152, 195; and the press, 124; and aliens, 128.
- GOSFORD, ARCHIBALD ACHESON, SECOND EARL OF, (1776-1849), governor of the Canadas (1835-8), his instructions, 110; fails with Lower Canadian assembly, 111; makes public his instructions, 112; lays the ten resolutions before the assembly, 114; recommends suspension of the constitution, ib.
- GOSSELIN, L'ABBÉ A., his Épisode de l'histoire de la Dîme au Canada, 40 note 2; his L'Église du Canada après la Conquête, 42 note 4.
- GOVIN, SIR L., and disallowance of provincial Acts, 498-500.
- GOURLAY, ROBERT, (1778-1863), arrives in Upper Canada, 131; his interest in colonization and his inquiries, ib.; his association with Barnabas Bidwell, ib.; is opposed by Strachan, 132, 133; summons convention at York, 132, 136, 141; his popularity, 132; Maitland's estimate of, 133; his convention condemned by the assembly, 134; attacks repressive legislation, ib.; refuses to leave the province and is imprisoned, ib.; his supporters persecuted, 135, 136; his character and influence, 135-6; his Statistical Account of Upper Canada, 84 note 5.
- GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND ITS PROVINCES, 378-99. See also Cabinet, Canada (Dominion of), Federalism, Governor-General, Legislative Power.
- GOVERNOR, office of in New France. See New France.
- GOVERNOR-GENERAL, his office and functions, 4; Russell's conception of the office of, 179; Howe's conception of the office of, 180-1; Sydenham's conception of the office of, 188-9; Metcalfe's conception of the office of, 230, 231, 233, 234-5, 243; Elgin's conception of the office of, 254, 255 note 1, 256, 257, 270; Baldwin's conception of the office of, 255, 270; and attendance at council, 270-1; and power of pardon, 340, 342, 343; and reservation of bills, 340, 341, 379; and channel of communications, 368, 380, 449; and crown, 378-81; and ministerial advice, 380 note 2; and appointment of judges, 379, 393; consultation over his appointment, 380, 380 note 1; and dismissal of ministers, 382; and deadlock, 384; and removal of judges, 394; and provincial Acts, 415, 497-500; and 'new status', commission, and instructions, 503-8.
- GRAHAM-HARRISON, Sir W., 466.
- GRANT, ALEXANDER, (1727-1813), president and administrator of Upper Canada (1805-6), his conflict with the assembly, 121-2.
- GRANT, WILLIAM LAWSON, 32 note 1.
- GRANVILLE, GRANVILLE GEORGE LEVEYSON-GOWER, SECOND EARL, (1815-91), colonial secretary (1868-70, 1886), and Hudson's Bay Co., 326; and federation of British Columbia, 335.
- GREELEY, HORACE, (1811-72), his tariff policy and Canada, 290.
- GREENOCK, SCOTLAND, Galt's speech at, 346.
- GRENADA, its civil government, (1763), 32.
- GRENVILLE, GEORGE, (1712-70), first lord of the treasury (1763-5), 41.
- GRENVILLE, THOMAS, (1755-1846), friend of Bagot, 210.
- GRENVILLE, WILLIAM WYNDHAM, BARON, (1759-1834), secretary for home and the colonies (1789-91), forwards draft of the Constitutional Act to Dorchester, 78; his conception of colonial government and colonial aristocracy, 78-9.
- GREY, SIR CHARLES EDWARD, (1785-1865), member of the Canada Commission (1835), 110.
- GREY OF FALLODEN, SIR EDWARD, FIRST VISCOUNT, (b. 1862), and commercial treaties, 348.
- GREY, SIR HENRY GEORGE, THIRD EARL, (1802-94), secretary for war and the colonies (1846-52), associated with Elgin, 249; his imperialism, 250-1; his 'responsible government' dispatches, 251-2, 265, 267-8; his conception of the imperial influence, 253;

- his attitude towards tariffs, ib.; and responsible government, 255; and Rebellion Losses Bill, 259; and developments in Nova Scotia, 265; his Colonial Policy of Lord John Russell, 253 note 4.
- Growth of Canadian National Feeling*, by W. S. Wallace, 339 note 1.
- GUADELOUPE, 32.
- Habeas Corpus*, writ of, 55, 74; Acts, 378.
- HAGERMAN, CHRISTOPHER ALEXANDER, (1792-1847), his political incapacity, 144-5; dismissed and reinstated, 146.
- HAGUE, CONFERENCES AND TRIBUNAL, 351, 352.
- HALDANE, RICHARD BURDON, VISCOUNT HALDANE, and Canadian constitutional cases, 398 note 4, 491, 492, 493, 523, 553; his conception of Canadian federalism, 408-12; on the expression 'the whole area of self-government', 440 note 2; on federal residuary power, 440.
- HALDIMAND, SIR FREDERICK, (1718-91), governor of Canada (1778-86), succeeds Burton at Three Rivers, 28; succeeds Carleton, 53; attempts to set up 'privy council' and is reprimanded, ib.; withholds his instructions from council, 56; the rigidity of his government, 74, 156.
- HALIBUT TREATY, 510, 511.
- HALIFAX, (founded 1749), first assembly summoned at, 80; English influences in, 171; Sydenham visits, 197, 215; Charlottetown conference (1864) adjourns to, 300; anti-federation convention at, 319-20; its defences, 354, 355.
- HAMILTON, ALEXANDER, (1754-1804), and constitution of the United States, 402, 414.
- HAMILTON, HENRY, (d. 1796), lieutenant-governor of Lower Canada (1782-5), opposes Haldimand, is dismissed, 74.
- HANCOCK, PROFESSOR W. K., 561 note 1.
- HANOVER, 447.
- HARDING, A. SIR, 490 note 1.
- HARRISSE, H., his Notes pour servir à l'histoire de la Nouvelle-France, 8 notes 1, 2.
- HARRISON, SAMUEL BEALEY, (d. 1867), lays Russell's dispatches on table of assembly, 202; and resolutions on responsible government, 204-5, 213, 218, 237, 238, 242, 244; advises Bagot to send for Baldwin and La Fontaine, 218.
- HARVEY, SIR JOHN, (1778-1852), lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick (1837-41), of Nova Scotia (1846-52), and Durham, 169; carries out reforms in New Brunswick, 170, 196, 267; receives 'responsible government' dispatch from Grey, 251-2, 265; and responsible government in Nova Scotia, 266.
- HEAD, SIR EDMUND WALKER, (1805-68), governor of Canada (1854-61), intention to appoint him to Upper Canada, 150 note 1; refuses Brown's request for dissolution, 270; on governor's presence at council meetings, 271.
- HEAD, SIR FRANCIS BOND, (1793-1875), lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada (1836-8), communicates his instructions to the legislature, 111; his appointment and instructions, 148, 150; his Narrative, 150 note 2; his council, 151; his conception of responsible government, 151-2, 177; his political methods, 152-3, 195; his recall, 153; his 'bread and butter' assembly, 154.
- HEIGHTS OF ABRAHAM (named after Abraham Martin, 1589-1664), 24.
- HENDERSON, G. F., 493 note 6.
- HERSCHELL, FARRER, FIRST BARON HERSCHELL, (1837-99), 421.
- HERTZOG, RT. HON. GENERAL, 521 note 8.
- HEY, WILLIAM, (d. 1797), chief justice of Quebec (1766-77), his proposed legal system for Quebec, 46; consulted on drafting of Quebec Act, 50.
- HIGGINSON, CAPTAIN, Metcalfe's secretary, his interview with La Fontaine, 237-8.
- HIGH COMMISSIONER, office of, created, 346; J. A. Macdonald's conception of the office of, 346 note 2.
- HILLSBOROUGH, WILLS HILL, FIRST EARL OF, AFTERWARDS FIRST MARQUIS OF DOWNSHIRE, (1718-93), president of the board of trade and plantations (1763-5); colonial secretary (1768-72); his opinion of the proclamation of 1763, 39; and boundaries under Quebec Act, 62.
- HINCKS, SIR FRANCIS, (1807-85), his Reminiscences, 150 note 1, 238 note 1; his Brief Review, &c., 168 note 2;

- included in Bagot's council, 217; his interpretation of the Metcalfe crisis, 243; his Political History, 243 note 2; supports Elgin in The Times, 260; forms ministry with Morin, 263; his defeat, 264; and tariffs, 273.
- Histoire du Canada*, of F. X. Garneau, 28 note 4, 31 note 1.
- Historical Journal of the Campaigns . . . 1757-60*, by John Knox (ed. A. G. Doughty), 26 note 1.
- HOLTON, LUTHER HAMILTON, (1817-80), and Quebec resolutions, 307.
- HONG-KONG, MacDonnell of New Brunswick removed to, 309.
- HONOURS, the prerogative of and legislative power over, 495-7.
- HOPE, HENRY, (d. 1789), lieutenant-governor and administrator of Quebec (1785-6), 74, 76.
- HOWAY, FREDERICK WILLIAM, his Attitude of Governor Seymour towards Confederation, 334 note 1.
- HOWE, JOSEPH, (1804-73), his early reform resolutions, 171; his letters on responsible government, 180-1, 203, 252; conflict with lieutenant-governor, 196-7, 206, 265; supports Elgin, 266; unable to attend Charlottetown conference, 300; opposes federation, 309, 318-19; enters federal ministry, 320.
- HOWLAND, SIR WILLIAM PEARCE, (1811-1907), 317, 318.
- Hudson's Bay and Pacific Territories*, by Alexander Morris, 289 note 3.
- HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY, boundaries of Quebec extended to territory of, 52 note 1; Galt suggests the annexation of its territories, 284; its trade rivalries, 323; imperial report on (1857), 324; federal debate on, 325; surrender of its rights, 326, 329; and Pacific colonies, 331-6.
- HUGUENOTS, excluded from New France, 3, 9, 12.
- HUME, JOSEPH, (1777-1855), his 'baneful domination' letter to W. L. Mackenzie, 147; recommends Head to W. L. Mackenzie, 150 note 2.
- HUMPHRIES, I. A., 530.
- HUNDRED ASSOCIATES, see Company of New France.
- HUNT, HENRY, (1773-1835), Maitland likens Gourlay to, 133.
- HUNTER, PETER, (1746-1805), lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada (1799-1805), his arrival, 120; Thorpe's estimate of, 122; Weekes's estimate of, 123.
- HUNTLEY, SIR HENRY VERE, (1795-1864), lieutenant-governor of Prince Edward Island (1841-7), 268.
- IMMIGRATION, early limitations on Dominion control of, 340; the distribution of legislative power over, 433, 434, 437.
- IMPERIAL CONFERENCES, 352, 358-9, 484, 500-39.
- 'IMPERIAL COUNCIL', 358.
- IMPERIAL FEDERATION, 346, 367.
- IMPERIAL PREFERENCE, 346, 347, 349.
- Imperial Unity and the Dominions*, by A. B. Keith, 413 note 2, 415 note 4, 434 note 3.
- IMPERIAL WAR CABINET, Canadian ministers attend, 365; Borden's conception of, 366; and channels of communication, 368; its nature, 369.
- IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE, (of 1917), and Canadian autonomy, 367; (of 1918), and channels of communication, 368.
- INDIANS, and franchise, 388.
- 'INITIATIVE', see Referendum.
- INSKIP, RT. HON. SIR T., 536.
- INSTRUCTIONS OF GOVERNOR-GENERAL, see Governor-General.
- INTENDANT, see NEW FRANCE.
- INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY, 287-8, 310, 311, 314, 318.
- INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES, 350, 352, 370.
- INTERPRETING THE STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER, 534-9.
- IRISH FREE STATE, 506, 509, 524.
- Irishman in Canada, The*, by N. F. Davin, 217 note 4.
- JACKSON, JOHN MILLS, and Gore, 124-5; his View of Upper Canada, 125 note 1; introduces Canadian question in house of commons, 125; estimate of, 126.
- JAMAICA, 232, 249, 256.
- JENNINGS, PROFESSOR W. I., 461 note 1, 477 note 1, 521 note 2.
- JESUITS, in New France, 10, 12.
- JOHNSTONE, JAMES WILLIAM, (1793-1873), and federation, 284.
- JONES, G. M., joint author of Annexation, Preferential Trade, and Reciprocity, 260 note 3.

- JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL, see Appeals and Criminal Appeals.
- JUDICIAL SYSTEMS, under proclamation of 1763, 37-8; under the Quebec Act, 72-4; under the Constitutional Act, 82, 90, 118; under the B.N.A. Act 1867, 393-9.
- Justice and Administrative Law*, by W. A. Robson, 480 note 5.
- Justice and Policy of the late Act of Parliament*, by William Knox, 63 note 1.
- KAMOURASKA, 26.
- KAYE, J. W., his Life and Correspondence of Metcalfe, 211 note 1, 232 notes 1 and 2, 233 notes 1 and 2, 234 notes 1 and 2, 236 notes 1 and 2, 238 note 2, 245 notes 2 and 3, 246 note 1.
- KEITH, A. BERRIEDALE, his Responsible Government in the Dominions, 407 note 2, 415 note 4, 429 note 1, 434 note 3; his Imperial Unity and the Dominions, 413 note 2, 415 note 4, 434 note 3; his War Government in the Dominions, 434 note 3; his Constitutional Law, 495; generally, 521 note 1, 542 note 1.
- KENNEDY, W. P. M., 482 note 1, 484 notes 1 and 2, 485 notes 2 and 3, 488 note 2, 489 notes 1 and 2, 494 note 1, 496 note 1, 498 note 1, 502 note 3, 517 note 2, 530, 542 note 1, 550 note 3, 565 notes 1 and 2.
- KENNY, SIR EDWARD, (1800-91), represents English-speaking Roman Catholics in first federal cabinet, 318.
- KETCHUM, JESSE, Upper Canadian reformer, 141, 147.
- KING, THE RT. HON. WILLIAM LYON MACKENZIE, (b. 1874); and formation of his cabinet, 381 note 1; and British North America Act, 450; and constitutional changes, 453-4; and Lord Byng, 503; and treaties, 510-13; and constituent powers, 515; and abdication, 555, 557, 563-4.
- King and His Dominion Ministers, The*, by the Hon. Mr. Justice Evatt, 505 note 2, 521 note 2.
- 'KING OF CANADA', proposals for use of term, 518-20; not legally correct, 565.
- 'KINGDOM OF CANADA', 314-15, 518-20.
- KINGSTON (founded 1783, capital of the province of United Canada February 10, 1841-May 10, 1844), 120, 201, 205.
- KNOX, JOHN, author of An Historical Journal of the Campaigns . . . 1757-60, 26 note 1.
- KNOX, WILLIAM, (1732-1810), under-secretary of state for America (1770-82), consulted on the Quebec Act, 50; defends policy of the Quebec Act, 62-3; his Justice and Policy of the late Act of Parliament, 63 note 1; discusses British colonial policy, 64; his Extra Official State Papers, 64 note 1, 78 note 2; suggests colonial aristocracy, 78 note 2.
- LABOUCHERE, HENRY, see Taunton, Baron.
- LABRADOR, 33 note 5, 51, 52.
- L'Ancien Barreau au Canada*, by J.-E. Roy, 28 note 3.
- La Crise Ministérielle*, by D. B. Viger, 244 note 3.
- LA FAYETTE, MARIE JEAN PAUL ROCH YVES GILBERT MOTIER, MARQUIS DE, (1757-1834), 69.
- LA FONTAINE, SIR LOUIS HIPPOLYTE, BART., (1807-64), and Sydenham, 193, 205; recommended to Bagot, 218; is approached by Bagot, 222; agrees on terms with Bagot, 223; attorney-general for Canada East, 224; his political differences with Metcalfe, 234-5; his interview with Metcalfe's secretary, 237-8; his conception of responsible government, ib.; his political break with Metcalfe, 242-3; is sent for by Elgin, 255; and Rebellion Losses Bill, 258; and clergy reserves and seigniorial tenure, 262; his resignation, 263. See also Correspondence between, &c.
- LA HONTAN, ARMAND LOUIS DE DELONDARCE, BARON DE, (1666-1715), quoted, 14.
- LAIRD, DAVID, (1833-1914), first lieutenant-governor of North-West Territories, 330.
- LAPOINTE, RT. HON. E., and Colonial Stock Act, 501; and treaties, 511; and constituent powers, 515; and appeals, 526, 527.
- LAREAU, E., joint author of Le Droit Civil Canadien, 28 notes 1 and 2, 42 note 3.
- LA ROCHEFOUCAULD-LIANCOURT, FRAN-

- ÇOIS ALEXANDRE FRÉDÉRIC DE, (1747-1827), quoted, 118.
- LARTIGUE, JEAN JACQUES, (1777-1840), Roman catholic bishop of Montreal (1836-40), his pastoral against rebellion, 114.
- LA SALLE, ROBERT CAVELIER DE, (1643-87), 322.
- LASKI, H. J., his Problem of Sovereignty, 428 note 4.
- LATHAM, R. T. E., 561.
- LAURIER, RT. HON. SIR WILFRID, (1841-1919), prime minister of Canada (1896-1911), and racialism in Lower Canada, 157 note 1; his defeat on reciprocity, 340; and consultation on international affairs, 352-3; on defence, 356; and federal electoral divisions, 386; member of Dorion's cénacle, 405. See also Skelton, O. D.; Willison, J. S.
- LAUSANNE, TREATY OF, Mr. Mackenzie King and, 511.
- LAVAL, FRANÇOIS DE MONTMORENCY, (1623-1708), vicar apostolic (1658), bishop of Quebec (1674-88), 10.
- LA VÉRENDRYE, PIERRE GAULTIER DE VARENNES, SIEUR DE, (1685-1749), 323.
- Law and Custom of the South African Constitution*, by W. P. M. Kennedy and H. J. Schlosberg, 542 note 1.
- Law and the Constitution*, by W. I. Jennings, 461 note 1, 521 note 2.
- Law of Nationality in Canada*, by W. P. M. Kennedy, 485 note 2.
- Law of the Canadian Constitution*, by W. H. P. Clement, 432 note 2.
- Law of the Constitution*, by A. V. Dicey, 428 note 4.
- LAWRENCE, CHARLES, (1709-60), lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia (1753-6), governor-in-chief (1756-60), summons first assembly at Halifax, 80.
- LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION, his federal statutory office, 390.
- LEAGUE OF NATIONS, Canada's membership, 372, 446, 452, 454; criticism of, 373-4.
- Le Canadien*, founded, 94; suppressed, 96; its significance, 157.
- Le Droit Civil Canadien*, by G. Doutre and E. Lareau, 28 notes 1, 2, 42 note 3.
- LEFROY, PROFESSOR A. H. F., his Legislative Power in Canada, 393 note 2, 427; his Canada's Federal System, 415 note 4; his Canadian Constitutional Law, 424 note 2, 427 note 2.
- LEGISLATIVE POWER, in Canada and the provinces, 378-9; its distribution, 433-44, 488-97, 545-54; considered as a whole, 435-8; its general scheme, 438-9; residuary, 439-40; its completeness, 440-1; 'aspects' of, 441-3; intrusions of dominion on provincial, and vice versa, 443-4.
- LÉPINE, AMBROISE DYDIME, his sentence and Dufferin, 342.
- Le Régime Militaire, 1760-1764*, by B. Sulte, 28 note 7.
- Les Débuts de Régime parlementaire*, by Thomas Chapais, 89 note 2.
- Les Officiers d'état-major . . . sous le régime français*, by P.-G. Roy, 15 note 1.
- LETÉLLIER DE ST. JUST, LUC, (1820-81), lieutenant-governor of Quebec (1876-9), his dismissal, 383 note 2, 415.
- Letter from Thomas Lord Lyttelton to William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, on the Quebec Bill*, 64 note 3.
- Letter on the Ministerial Crisis*, by E. G. Wakefield, 243 note 3.
- Letters on Responsible Government*, by R. B. Sullivan, 244 note 2.
- LEWIS, GEORGE CORNEWALL, (1806-63), his Use and Abuse of some Political Terms, 431 note 1.
- LIBERAL-CONSERVATISM, in the Canadas, 257, 259, 264.
- LIBERAL CONVENTIONS, of 1859, 289; of 1867, 317; of 1893, 386, 387-8.
- LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS, their dismissal, 303, 383, 415; and power of pardon, 305, 314; their executive authority, 378, 380; their position and constitutional functions, 380-1, 415, 504 note 3; and dismissal of ministries, 383; their office and the 'initiative and referendum', 392.
- Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier*, by O. D. Skelton, 157 note 1, 329 note 3, 344 note 1, 355 note 1.
- Life and Speeches of the Hon. George Brown*, by Alexander Mackenzie, 272 note 1, 289 note 5, 294 note 1.
- Life of Sir A. T. Galt*, by O. D. Skelton, 285 note 1, 286 note 1, 287 note 1, 314 note 1, 316 note 1.
- LINCOLN, ABRAHAM, (1809-65), and war panic, 277, 292. See also Charnwood.
- LIVERPOOL, ROBERT BANKS JENKINSON,

- SECOND EARL OF, (1770-1828), secretary for war and the colonies (1809-12), and Ryland, 97; and responsible government, 176-7.
- LIVIOUS, PETER, (1727-95), chief justice of Quebec (1777-86), his dispute with Carleton, 53, 56.
- LLOYD GEORGE, RT. HON. DAVID, (b. 1863), forms government in 1916, 364; and war cabinet, 365; and Imperial conference of 1921, 369; and Canadian minister at Washington, 370; and right of secession, 448.
- LONGLEY, JAMES WILBERFORCE, (b. 1849), his Joseph Howe, 300 note 1.
- LORNE, JOHN DOUGLAS SUTHERLAND CAMPBELL, MARQUIS OF, AFTERWARDS NINTH DUKE OF ARGYLL, (1845-1914), governor-general (1878-83), approves of consulting Canada on appointments to office of governor-general, 380 note 1.
- LOUIS XIV (1643-1715), 12, 17.
- LOUIS PHILIPPE, his example recommended to Bagot by Peel, 220.
- LYMBURNER, ADAM, (1746-1836), appears at bar of house of commons in favour of an assembly, 77; opposes division of Quebec, 80.
- LYONS, RICHARD BICKERTON PEMELL, SECOND BARON AND FIRST EARL, (1817-87), and war scare, 277, 292.
- LYTTELTON, RT. HON. ALFRED, (1857-1913), colonial secretary (1903-5), and name of colonial conference, 358.
- LYTTELTON, THOMAS, SECOND BARON LYTTELTON, (1744-79), reputed author of A Letter . . . to William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, 64 note 3; defends Quebec Act in house of lords, 67; his Speech . . . on a Motion . . . for a Repeal of the Canada Bill, 67 note 2.
- LYTTON, EDWARD GEORGE EARLE LYTTON BULWER, BARON, (1803-73), colonial secretary (1858-9), receives Canadian delegates on federation, 286-8.
- MACDONALD, ANDREW ARCHIBALD, (1829-), his notes on the Quebec conference, 301.
- MACDONALD, HON. JAMES, (d. 1912), minister of justice (1878-81), 418.
- MACDONALD, SIR JOHN ALEXANDER, (1815-91), prime minister of the dominion (1867-73, 1878-91), minister of justice (1867-73), and liberal-conservatism, 257, 259, 264; forms ministries with Taché and Cartier, 264; defends Galt's tariff policy, 276; and 'representation by population', 281; and 'double-majority', ib.; forms ministry with Cartier (1858), 286; supports general federation, 289-90; notes economic influences in federation movement, 291; defeated, 294; receives overtures from Brown, ib.; negotiates with Brown, 294-7; at Charlottetown and Quebec conferences, 299-304; his speech on Quebec resolutions, 305-6; criticizes Tilley's policy, 308; visits England over federation, 309; asked to form government on the death of Taché, 310; his diplomacy in relation to the federal proposals, 312-13; at the Westminster Palace Hotel conference, 313-15; his disappointment over British apathy, 315; his difficulties in forming the first federal ministry, 316-18; returned to power in first federal elections, 318; deals with Nova Scotian situation, 319-20; and Western Territories, 324-5; and Red River Rebellion, 327-8; and the creation of Manitoba, 329; recommends Musgrave as governor of British Columbia, 335; and Prince Edward Island, 336-7; and 'National Policy', 340; and Washington treaty, 344; and trade expansion, ib.; and railways, 344-5; and office of high commissioner, 345-6; and colonial aid in war, 355 note 3; and consultation on appointment of governor-general, 380 note 1; and federal electoral divisions, 386; and provincial voters' lists and dominion franchise, 387-8; and use of political terms, 404; his conception of the Senate, 306, 412-13; and office of lieutenant-governor, 414; and provincial legislation, 417, 419; and legislative powers, 488-95; and position of governor-general, 504. See also Pope, Sir Joseph, Memoirs.
- MACDONALD, JOHN SANDFIELD, (1812-72), sent for by Monck, 270; forms government on 'double majority' principle, 281-2; and Quebec resolutions, 307; and federation of Nova Scotia, 319.

- MACDONALD, DEAN V. C., 488 note 1, 493 note 4.
- Macdonald's Correspondence*, edited by Sir Joseph Pope, 490 note 2.
- MACDONNELL, SIR RICHARD GRAVES, (1814-81), lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia (1864-5), his attitude towards federation, 300; his removal, 309.
- MACKENZIE, ALEXANDER, (1822-92), premier of Canada (1873-8), his Life and Speeches of the Hon. George Brown, 272 note 1, 289 note 5, 294 note 1; is refused appointment of additional members to the senate by the imperial government, 384 note 2.
- MACKENZIE, SIR ALEXANDER, (1755?-1820), 323.
- MACKENZIE, WILLIAM LYON, (1795-1861), his printing press wrecked, 140; elected to assembly, 141; his early political platform, 143-4; his dispute with the assembly and his visit to London, 144-6; mayor of Toronto, 146; publishes Hume's 'baneful domination' letter, 147; and Seventh Report on Grievances, 147-8; disliked by Head, 151; causes of the failure of his rebellion, 162, 165.
- MACMILLAN, RT. HON. LORD, 483.
- MACNAB, SIR ALLAN NAPIER, BART., (1798-1862), and Sydenham, 208; favoured by Stanley, 214; advises Stanley on Canadian affairs, 220; prepares to use French vote to defeat Bagot's executive, 222; elected speaker, 246; and Elgin, 256; forms ministry with Morin, 264.
- MAGDALEN ISLANDS, 51.
- MAGNA CARTA, 378.
- MAINE, SIR H., 464.
- MAITLAND, SIR PEREGRINE, (1777-1854), lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada (1818-28), his arrival, 129, 133; his opinion of Gourlay, 133; urges assembly to condemn conventions, 133-4; leads agitation against land grants to Gourlay's supporters, 135; and alien question, 137-8; and clergy reserves, 139; close of his régime, 141.
- MANITOBA, PROVINCE OF, its creation, 329; and French language, 389 note 2; its legislative council, 391; and franchise, ib.; and divorce, 396; disallowance of its Acts, 417, 419, 420.
- MANSFIELD, WILLIAM MURRAY, FIRST EARL OF (1705-93), lord chief justice (1756-88), and legality of proclamation of 1763, 36; and policy of proclamation of 1763, 41.
- MARITIME PROVINCES, representative institutions set up in, 80-1; and Durham, 169-73; reforms in, 196-7, 265-8; Galt's federation scheme, 284; and intercolonial railway, 287-8, 310, 311, 314, 318; and federation idea, 284, 292; and federation, 298-304, 308-9, 310-12, 314, 318-20. See also New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island.
- MARRIAGE, disabilities in Canada West, 138-9, 141.
- Marriage Law in Upper Canada*, by W. R. Riddell, 139 note 1.
- MARRIED WOMEN, nationality of, 485-8.
- MARSHALL, C. J., 530.
- MASÈRES, FRANCIS, (1731-1824), attorney-general of Quebec (1766-9), and proclamation of 1763, 36; draws up draft legal system for Quebec, 46; discusses Quebec problem in England, 47; is consulted over constitutional proposals, 50; opposes the Quebec Act, 67; his Additional Papers concerning the Province of Quebec, 72 note 4.
- MASSEY, HON. V., 509.
- MATTHEWS, JOHN, Upper Canadian reformer, 139, 140.
- MCDougALL, WILLIAM, (1822-1905), at Quebec conference, 304; at liberal convention (1867), 317; and annexation of Western Territories, 325; visits England in the matter of Hudson's Bay Co., 326; appointed lieutenant-governor of North-West Territories, 327; and Red River Rebellion, 327-8.
- McGEE, THOMAS D'ARCY, (1825-68), favours federation, 289, 290; and first federal cabinet, 318.
- McGILLIGAN, P., 521 note 8.
- McGILLIVRAY, J. A., 553.
- McINNES, THOMAS ROBERT, lieutenant-governor of British Columbia (1897-1900), removed from office, 383 note 2, 415.
- McTAVISH, WILLIAM, (d. 1870), of Hudson's Bay Co., 327.
- MEIGHEN, RT. HON. ARTHUR, (b. 1876), and the imperial problem, 370, 453; and 'Byng episode', 503; and declaration of war, 541.

- Memoir of Lord Sydenham*, by G. Poulett Scrope (q.v.).
- Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald*, by Sir Joseph Pope, 305 note 1, 309 note 1, 310 notes 1 and 3, 311 note 1, 314 note 2, 318 note 1, 324 note 1, 325 note 1, 327 note 1, 328 note 1, 403 note 1.
- MERCHANT SHIPPING, 533-4.
- MERCHANTS, BRITISH, in Quebec, create early political difficulties, 35, 37, 38; and Murray, 41-4; their agitation for an assembly, 44-5, 47; their opposition to the Quebec Act, 67.
- MEREDITH, SIR WILLIAM, (d. 1790), privy councillor (1774-7), author of A Letter . . . to William Pitt, 64 note 3.
- METCALFE, SIR CHARLES THEOPHILUS, FIRST BARON METCALFE, (1785-1846), governor of Canada (1843-5), his experience, dispatches, and conception of colonial government, 211-14; his appointment welcomed by Bagot, 227-8; his political principles, 230-1; regrets Bagot's experiment, 230; creates a political dilemma for himself, ib.; refuses to believe in responsible government in a colony, 231, 239; his motives and character, 231-2; his conception of the empire, 232; regrets that Canada is unlike Jamaica, ib.; determines not to yield to reform, ib.; 233; his 'loyalty' test, 232, 241; his attitude towards his council, 233-4; fears encroachments of the executive, 234; fears for office of governor-general, 234-8, 241, 243, 245; anticipates disagreement with La Fontaine, 234-5; analyses political movements in the province, 234-6; and patronage, 236-7; acts as leader of a party, 238, 241, 245; and executive responsibility, 237-8; falls back on Sydenham's system, 239; doubts Durham's meaning, ib.; opens legislature, 241; and Secret Societies' Bill, 241, 243; his dispute with Baldwin and La Fontaine over patronage, 242-3; justifies his attitude, 243; is defended by Ryerson, 244; forms provisional government, ib.; is defended by Stanley, 245; his pyrrhic victory, 246; his ministry fails, 246-7. See also 'Addresses'; Hincks, F.; Kaye, J. W.; Ryerson, A. E.; Sullivan, R. B.; Wakefield, E. G.
- METHODISTS, THE, disliked by Simcoe, 117-18; their opposition to Strachan, and their marriage disabilities, 138-9; and clergy reserves, 139, 153; and constitutional reform, 147, 152-3; support Metcalfe, 246.
- MILITIA, THE, its control by Canadians demanded by Canadian National Association, 340; and imperial officers, ib., 354-5.
- 'MILITIA BILL CRISIS', 276-8, 292.
- MILLER, WILLIAM, (1834-1912), supports federation in Nova Scotia, 311-12.
- MILLS, HON. DAVID, (1831-1903), minister of justice (1897-1902), his Report on the Boundaries of Ontario, 52 note 1; and provincial Acts, 423.
- MILNES, SIR ROBERT SHORE, BART., (1746-1836), lieutenant-governor of Lower Canada (1797-1808), succeeds Prescott, 92; his dread of popular government, ib.
- MINISTERS OF JUSTICE, their reports on provincial legislation, 417-26.
- MIQUELON, ISLAND OF, 32.
- MONCK, SIR CHARLES STANLEY, FOURTH VISCOUNT, (1819-94), governor of Canada (1861-7), governor-general (1867-8), sends for J. S. Macdonald, 270; and 'Militia Bill crisis', 277; and Charlottetown conference, 299; and Quebec resolutions, 305; asks J. A. Macdonald to form ministry, 310; his anxiety over federation, 312; at Westminster Palace Hotel conference, 312-14; and 'double majority' principle, 316 note 2.
- MONCKTON, LIEUT.-GENERAL ROBERT, (1726-82), appoints military governors, 25.
- MONTCALM, LOUIS JOSEPH, MARQUIS DE, (1712-59), 23, 302.
- MONTESQUIEU, CHARLES DE SECONDAT, BARON DE, (1689-1755), his doctrine of the division of powers, 454.
- MONTGOLFIER, ÉTIENNE, (1712-91), difficulties over his appointment as bishop of Quebec, 42; Murray's description of him, 42 note 3.
- MONTMAGNY, CHARLES JACQUES HUAULT DE, governor of New France (1636-48), his commission, 10 note 1.
- MONTMORENCY, HENRI, DUC DE, (1595-1632), see Company of.
- MONTREAL, CAPITULATION OF (September 8, 1760), 30, 40.

- MONTREAL, CITY OF, (founded 1642), its representation under the Constitutional Act, 88; and Rebellion Losses Bill, 258.
- MONTREAL, DISTRICT OF, under French régime, 15; under 'régime militaire', 26-7.
- Montreal Gazette* (founded 1785), The, accused of 'malicious libel', 93.
- MONTS, PIERRE DU GUAST, SIEUR DE, (1560-1611), see Company of.
- MORIN, AUGUSTE NORBERT, (1803-65), reputed author of the ninety-two resolutions, 108; appointed commissioner of lands by Bagot, 225; forms ministry with Hincks, 263; his defeat, 264; forms ministry with MacNab, ib.; elevated to bench, ib. See also Correspondence between, &c.
- MORISON, J. L., his British Supremacy and Canadian Self-government, 199 note 3.
- MORRIS, ALEXANDER, (1826-89), supports federation idea, 289; his Hudson's Bay and Pacific Territories, 289 note 3; brings Brown and Macdonald together, 294; and North-west, 324.
- MORRIS, ROBERT, (1734-1806), (delegate from Pennsylvania to the federal convention (1787)), his conception of the articles of confederation, 402.
- MORRIS, WILLIAM, (1786-1838), Upper Canadian reformer, 139.
- MORSE, LIEUTENANT-COLONEL ROBERT, (1743?-1818), his suggestions for British North American union, 400.
- MORTON, ROSE AND Co., and financial affairs in Prince Edward Island, 336.
- MOST-FAVOURLED-NATION TREATIES, 347, 348, 349.
- MOUNTAIN, JACOB, (1750-1825), Anglican bishop of Quebec (1793-1825), represents position of church of Rome, 92.
- MOWAT, SIR OLIVER, (1820-1903), minister of justice (1896-7), at Quebec conference, 304; and disallowance of provincial Acts, 423.
- MUNRO, W. B., 19 note 1, 20 note 3, 54 note 3.
- MURDOCH, SIR THOMAS WILLIAM CLINTON, (1809-91), civil secretary to Sydenham and Bagot (1839-42), consulted by Stanley over Bagot's policy, 221.
- MURRAY, SIR GEORGE, (1772-1846), provisional lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada (1815), secretary for war and the colonies (1828-30), recommends French-Canadians to Bagot, 210.
- MURRAY, JAMES, (1719?-94), governor of Canada (1764-8), appointed military governor of Quebec, 26; appoints judges in Quebec, ib.; establishes military courts, 26-7; notes litigious character of the Canadians, 28; his estimate of the 'régime militaire', 29; his military rule pleasing to the Canadians, 29-30; his commission and instructions as governor-in-chief, 33; does not favour an assembly, 34; creates system of courts, 37; his generosity to the Canadians, 38, 58; is ordered to encourage the Anglican church, 39; asks freedom from religious disabilities for Canadians, 41; is ordered to introduce concessions, 42; opposes Montgolfier's appointment as bishop, ib.; his opinion of the British merchants, 43; is attacked and recalled, 44.
- MUSGRAVE, SIR ANTHONY, (1828-88), governor of British Columbia (1869-71), and federation, 335.
- NANTES, EDICT OF, (1598), 8.
- NAPOLEON I, (1769-1821), the wars of, 69, 97; his fall increases emigration to Upper Canada, 128.
- Narrative*, A, by Sir F. B. Head, 150 note 2.
- NATIONAL POLICY, THE, 340.
- NATIONALITY, CANADIAN, see Canadian Nationals.
- NATIONALITY, LAW OF, 484-8.
- NATIONALITY OF MARRIED WOMEN, 485-8.
- Nations within the Empire*, by W. E. Raney, 398 note 3.
- NAVIGATION ACTS, 4, 261.
- NAVY, see Defence.
- NEILSON, JOHN, (1776-1848), opposes proposed union (1822), 103; his estimate of the ninety-two resolutions, 108; his constitutionalism, 109, 160; creates difficulties for Bagot, 216, 221.
- NEWARK, CAPITAL OF UPPER CANADA, (1791-4), 117, 120.
- NEW BRUNSWICK, PROVINCE OF, representative institutions in, 2, 80, 81; dispatch on reform of its executive, 152, 170; its councils separated, 170;

- deputation from visits England, ib.; and dispatch on tenure of offices, 196, 267; Colebrooke's régime in, 267; coming of responsible government in, 267-8; representatives from at Charlottetown, 299; representatives from at Quebec conference, 300-4; and federation proposals, 308, 309, 311, 313, 314; its court of probate, 379, 393; its legislative council, 391; and divorce, 396; and disallowed provincial Acts, 419, 420.
- NEWCASTLE, DISTRICT OF, Sir F. B. Head's address to the electors of, 154 note 1.
- NEWCASTLE, HENRY PELHAM FIENNES PELHAM CLINTON, FIFTH DUKE OF, (1811-64), secretary for war and the colonies (1852-4), colonial secretary (1859-64), receives appeal from Sheffield against Canadian tariffs, 273; his lack of tact, 274; his apologies, 276.
- NEWFOUNDLAND, boundaries of its government, 51, 52; and federation, 314; provision for its inclusion in the dominion, 314, 322; refuses to enter federation, 336; and changes of its constitution, 450.
- NEW FRANCE, its paternal government, 1, 2; its Roman catholic character, 3; and the exclusion of Huguenots, ib., 9, 12; company of, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12; its administration under companies, 7-11; under Montmagny, 10 note 1; passes under royal control, 11; its failure under chartered companies, 11-12; its organization as a royal province, 12-17; its sovereign council created, 13; the position and duties of its governors, 14; the position and duties of its intendants, 14-15; the organization and work of its sovereign council, 15-16; its bishop, 15; its superior council, 16; its three estates, 16-17; its seigniorial system, 19-22; Talon and its colonization, 19; its failure, 22-3; its influence on the dominion, 23-4; and western lands, 322-3.
- NEW HAMPSHIRE, its bill of rights, 454.
- NEW WESTMINSTER (founded 1859), 333.
- NEW ZEALAND, and changes of its constitution, 450.
- NIAGARA, the Weekes-Thorpe episode at, 123; Gourlay imprisoned at, 134.
- NINETY-TWO RESOLUTIONS, passed (1834) by the assembly of Lower Canada, 107-8; attributed to Morin, 108; Neilson's estimate of, ib.; their weakness and strength, 108-9; their significance, 109; their counterpart in Upper Canada, 147.
- NORMANBY, SIR CONSTANTINE HENRY PHIPPS, FIRST MARQUIS OF, AND SECOND EARL OF MULGRAVE, (1797-1863), secretary for war and the colonies (1839), 179.
- NORTH, FREDERICK, SECOND EARL OF GUILFORD, better known as Lord North, (1732-92), and Quebec Act, 3, 50, 66; his defence and explanation of the Quebec Act's enactments, 54, 55, 58; discloses government's motives in the Quebec Act, 63, 64, 65, 66.
- NORTH-WEST COMPANY, (1783-1821), 323.
- NORTH-WEST REBELLION, (1885), 330, 354.
- NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES, legislation in connexion with, 323; name given to lands not included in Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, 329, 330; their political organization, 330, 331.
- NORTH-WESTERN TERRITORY, and Galt's proposals (1858), 284; Brown and, 285; constitutional provision for its inclusion in Canada, 322; and annexation to Canada, 324-5; Act for its temporary government, 326; McDougall its lieutenant-governor, 327; its formal transference to Canada, 329.
- Notes pour servir à l'histoire de la Nouvelle France*, of Harisse, 8 notes 1, 2.
- NOVA SCOTIA, PROVINCE OF, and representative institutions, 2, 80; passes to British-crown, 25 note 1; its judicial system suggested as a type to Murray, 36; 'North-West angle' of, 71; suggestions (1830) for making its councils more independent, 169; its councils separated, 171, 172; and Howe's reform proposals, 171, 265; and Sydenham, 196-7; Falkland's failure in, 265; and dispatches on responsible government, ib.; and the coming of responsible government, 265-6; and the federation idea, 284, 292; and a maritime union, 298; and Charlottetown conference, 299; and Quebec conference, 300-4; and federation proposals, 309, 311-12, 313; and opposition to federation, 318-20; its court - of probate, 379, 393; its legislative council, 390-1; and franchise, 317, 391; and divorce, 396; and disallowance of its provincial Acts, 420, 498-500.

- OATH, coronation, 564; of public office in Canada, 565.
- Observations on a Proposed Method of amending the B.N.A. Act*, by I. A. Humphries, 530.
- OGDEN, CHARLES RICHARD, (1791-1866), attorney-general of Lower Canada, removed by Bagot, 222, 223.
- ONTARIO, PROVINCE OF, its creation, (1867), 318; has no second chamber, 391; and divorce, 396; and appeals to the privy council, 397-8; and disallowance of its provincial Acts, 418, 419, 423, 426; and constitutional powers of its lieutenant-governor, 504 note 1; and constituent powers, 515.
- ORANGEMEN, 240, 241.
- OREGON BOUNDARY DISPUTE, 249, 323, 331.
- OTTAWA (founded 1826; chosen by Queen Victoria as seat of government December 31, 1857; seat of government fixed at permanently by proclamation, October 20, 1865), made seat of government, 288; liberal convention at (1893), 386, 387, 388.
- PALMERSTON, HENRY JOHN TEMPLE, THIRD VISCOUNT, (1784-1865), and American Civil War, 291, 292.
- PANET, JEAN ANTOINE, (1751-1815), speaker of Lower Canadian assembly, 89; and Le Canadien, 94; and his militia commission, 95, 99.
- PAPINEAU, LOUIS JOSEPH, (1786-1871), speaker of assembly, 101; his character, ib.; organizes (1822) opposition against union, 103; his dispute with Dalhousie and Aylmer, 105-6; loses prominent supporters, 109; his popular gains, 110; his correspondence with M. S. Bidwell, 111; as popular leader, 114; and racialism, 160.
- PARDON, POWER OF, the lieutenant-governor's, 305, 314; the governor-general's, 340, 342, 343.
- PARIS, THE PEACE OF, (1763), and religion, 3, 39, 40, 41; and departure of Canadians from Quebec, 25 note 2; its territorial clauses, 32; the official interpretation of its religious clauses, 40-1.
- PARKER, CHARLES STUART, (1829-1910), his Sir Robert Peel from his Private Papers, 221 note 1.
- PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION, not a delegate, 406, 407; its sovereign nature, 407, 412.
- Parliamentary Powers of English Government Departments*, by J. Willis, 469 note 2, 474.
- PARLIAMENTS OF THE PROVINCES, not delegates, 406, 407; their sovereign nature, 412.
- PAYMENT OF MEMBERS, of the federal parliament, 386; of the provincial parliaments, 391.
- PEACE CONFERENCE, (1919), and Canada, 370-2; Canadian criticism of, 374-5.
- PEEL, SIR ROBERT, (1788-1850), advises Bagot in his dealings with a popular assembly, 220-1; Elgin's political chief, 249; defends Elgin in Rebellion Losses crisis, 259. See also Parker, C. S.
- PEMBINA, and McDougall's precarious position at, 328.
- PERLEY, HON. SIR GEORGE, (b. 1857), Canadian minister in London, 358, 361, 364.
- PERRY, PETER, Upper Canadian reformer, 139, 141, 144.
- PETITION OF RIGHT, (1628), 378.
- PETITIONS OF RIGHT, in the federal area, 395.
- PHILADELPHIA, the Continental Congress at (1774), 63; the federal convention of (1787), 402, 414.
- PITT, WILLIAM, see Chatham, Earl of.
- PITT, WILLIAM, (1759-1806), and political situation in Quebec, 77; and Constitutional Act of 1791, 84-6.
- Plan for a General Legislative Union*, by J. Sewell and J. B. Robinson, 400 note 4.
- Political History of Canada . . . 1840 . . . 1855*, by Francis Hincks, 243 note 2.
- POMPADOUR, JEAN ANTOINETTE POISSON, MARQUISE DE, (1721-64), and cession of Canada, 31.
- PONT-GRAVÉ, FRANÇOIS GRAVÉ, SIEUR DE, see Company of.
- POPE, JAMES COLLEDGE, (1826-85), and federation of Prince Edward Island, 336.
- POPE, JOHN HENRY, (1824-89), and Macdonald-Brown negotiations, 294.

- POPE, SIR JOSEPH, (b. 1854), his Memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald, 305 note 1, 309 note 1, 310 notes 1 and 3, 311 note 1, 314 note 2, 318 note 1, 324 note 1, 325 note 1, 327 note 1, 328 note 1, 403 note 1; his Macdonald's Correspondence, 490 note 2.
- PORRITT, EDWARD, (d. 1922), his Evolution of the Dominion of Canada, 414 note 1.
- PORTLAND, WILLIAM HENRY CAVENDISH BENTINCK, THIRD DUKE OF, (1738-1809), secretary for war and the colonies (1794), criticizes Simcoe's conception of colonial organization, 118.
- Position of the Privy Council*, by C. H. Tupper, 398 note 3.
- POUND, R., 530 note 4.
- POWELL, WILLIAM DUMMER, (1755-1834), chief justice of Upper Canada (1815-25), 129, 131 note 1, 134.
- PRESCOTT, ROBERT, (1725-1816), governor of Canada (1797-1807), succeeds Dorchester, 91; and land-granting abuses, 91-2.
- PRESENTMENT OF GRAND JURY OF QUEBEC, 44.
- PREVOST, SIR GEORGE, BART., (1767-1816), governor of Canada (1812-15), restores militia officers, 99; makes Bédard a judge, ib.; his policy of conciliation, ib.; his personal success, ib.
- PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND, and representative government, 80; Thorpe's experience in, 122; its councils separated, 172-3; its land problem, 173; and Huntley's régime, 268; and responsible government, ib.; represented at Charlottetown conference, 299-300; and at Quebec conference, 300-4; and federation proposals, 309; constitutional provisions for its inclusion in the dominion, 314, 322; and federation, 336-7; its legislative council, 391; and the franchise, ib.; and divorce, 396; and disallowance of provincial Acts, 417, 418.
- PRIVILEGES OF PARLIAMENT, 389, 392-3.
- PRIVY COUNCIL, IMPERIAL, see Appeals and Criminal Appeals.
- PRIVY COUNCIL OF CANADA, 380.
- PROBATE, COURTS OF, in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, 379, 393.
- Problem of Sovereignty*, by H. J. Laski, 428 note 4.
- PROCLAMATION OF 1763, establishes civil government in Quebec, 32-3; its scope, 33; its ambiguities, defects, and weaknesses, 34-6, 57; and Lord Mansfield, 36, 41; and Masères, 36; its revocation, ib., 51; criticized by Carleton, 60.
- 'PROTESTANT CLERGY', see Constitutional Act.
- Provinces of l'Amérique du Nord et d'une Union fédérale*, by J. C. Taché, 289 note 2.
- PROVINCES OF THE DOMINION, and federal cabinets, 317, 381, 413-14; their legislative powers, 378, 433-4; their executive governments, 383; their franchises, 387-8, 391; their legislatures, 391, 406, 407, 412; their powers to change their constitutions, 390-2, 393; the privileges of their legislatures, 393; their courts, 393-4, 397-8; their early subordinate position after federation, 405; the nature of their government, 406-7, 412; Lord Haldane's conception of their creation, 408-11; and disallowance of their Acts, 415-30, 500-1; their control over education, 433-4, 437; their control over agriculture and immigration, 434, 437; the general scheme of their legislative powers, 438-9; the general test of the validity of their Acts, 441; their legislation and 'aspects', 441-3; their legislation and intrusion, 443-4; and changes of the federal constitution, 450-1, 515, 528-33.
- Public and its Government*, by F. Frankfurter, 482 note 2.
- QUEBEC ACT OF 1774, (14 George III c. 83), and Roman catholicism, 3; and North, Burke, and Fox, 2, 3, 50, 54, 58, 63, 64, 65, 66; its preliminaries, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50; its enactment and general scope, 50, 51; its parliamentary discussion, 50, 51, 54, 55, 58, 63, 65; and Carleton's influence, 47, 48, 50, 54, 59-62; its generosity, 51, 58, 64; its religious provisions, 51, 57; its boundary provisions, 51-2; its machinery of government, 52-3; the functions of its executive and legislative councils, 53; its application by Carleton to the province, ib., 55, 56; its provisions for taxation, 54; its legal system, ib.; its necessity, 57; and

- previous reports on the state of the province, 58; and the colonial situation, 59-62; must be considered in relation to colonial policy as a whole, 62-3; and American revolution, 63; and the Thirteen Colonies, ib., 64, 65, 66; is opposed by Chatham, 64; the motives behind, ib.; the insincerity of the debates on, 65; Carleton's ambiguous dealings in connexion with, 66; is opposed by the city of London, 67; its virtues and defects, 67-70; its semi-official interpretation, 67; movements to repeal, ib.; its immediate results, ib.; its results in history, 68-70; its administration under the influence of the American revolution, 72; civil government and courts under, 72-4; is valued by the French-Canadians, 75; fails to satisfy conditions after 1783, 74-7; recognizes racial grouping of the French-Canadians, 156-7, 279.
- QUEBEC, CITY OF, (founded 1608), its syndics, 10, 16, 17; the states-general of New France summoned at, 16; seigniorial oath taken at, 19; its fall (1759), 25; under 'régime militaire', 26; its bishop, 42; its parliamentary representation under the Constitutional Act, 88; bill for gaols at, 93.
- QUEBEC CONFERENCE OF 1864, 300.
- QUEBEC, DISTRICT OF, under French régime, 15; under 'régime militaire', 26-7.
- Quebec Mercury, The*, (founded 1805), opposes French-Canadians, 93-4.
- QUEBEC, PROVINCE OF
- (i) 1759-91: 'régime militaire' in, 25-31; its civil government established, 32-8; its boundaries under proclamation of 1763, 33; the type of its civil government, 34; and protestant settlers, 35; and Murray's system of courts, 37-8; its civil government (1764-74), 39-49; and early policy of repression, 39-41; and liberal rule of Murray, 41-2; and legal concessions, 42; its bishop, ib.; its grand jury, 44; various reports on its affairs, 46-7; the problems of its government, 46-9; under Quebec Act, 52-5, 72-6; its administrative difficulties during the American revolution, 72; its system of justice under the Quebec Act, 72-3; its rigid government under Haldimand, 74; its newer problems after 1783, 74-6; its condition examined by Dorchester, 76; proposals to divide, 77; Dorchester's opinion on its division, 78; divided by order in council, 84; its racial groupings recognized, 156-7, 279.
- (ii) 1867-1922; Creation of the modern province of, 322; its legislative council, 390; and the franchise, 391; and divorce, 396-7; and disallowance of provincial Acts, 419, 420; and changes of the federal constitution, 450-1, 515.
- QUEBEC RESOLUTIONS OF 1864, 301, 304-8, 309, 312, 386, 403, 404, 409, 488.
- QUEBEC REVENUE ACTS, 34, 35 note 1, 96, 105, 106.
- QUESNEL, FREDERICK AUGUSTE, (d. 1866), withdraws his support from Papineau, 109.
- RADIO-TELEGRAPHIC CONVENTION, 350, 370.
- RAILWAYS, 337, 345. See also Canadian Pacific Railway and Intercolonial Railway.
- RAMSAY, JUSTICE, 416.
- RANEY, HON. W. E., his Nations within the Empire, 398 note 3.
- RATIFICATION OF TREATIES, dealing with trade and commerce, 348, 349, 350; at conclusion of war 1914-18, 372.
- REBELLION LOSSES BILL, (1849), 257-60.
- REBELLION OF 1837-8, 69, 115, 153-4, 160-1, 162, 165, 279.
- RECIPROCITY, Treaty of 1854 negotiated by Elgin, 4, 261, 290, 344, 351; Laurier's defeat on, 340.
- Recollections of Sixty Years*, by Sir Charles Tupper, 344 note 1, 351 note 1, 382 note 1.
- REDISTRIBUTION OF FEDERAL SEATS, 385.
- RED RIVER, Selkirk's settlement on, 323; Rebellion, 327-8.
- RE-ELECTION OF MINISTERS, 381.
- REFERENDUM, 392.
- REFORM CONVENTION OF 1859, its proposals for federation of the Canadas, 289.
- REFUSAL OF ASSENT TO BILLS, see Assent.
- 'RÉGIME MILITAIRE' in Quebec, (1759-64), 25-31; its different types of administration, 26-8; and district of

- Quebec, 26; and districts of Three Rivers and Montreal, 27-8; and French-Canadian militia officers, 27; criticism of, 28; British policy during, ib.; Gage's report on, 29; Murray's report on, ib.; Canadian opinion of, ib.; general estimate of, 30.
- Relations of the Colonies to the Empire*, by A. T. Galt, 346 note 2.
- Reminiscences of his Public Life*, by Francis Hincks, 150 note 1, 238 note 1.
- Report on the Boundaries of Ontario*, by David Mills, 52 note 1.
- Report on Ministers' Powers*, 466 note 1, 469.
- REPORTS, on the Canadas, (1828), 105, 106, 140, 142, 169; (1834) 109-10; (Gosford's, &c.), 112; on Hudson's Bay Co. (1857), 324; on provincial Acts by federal ministers of justice, 416-26. See also Durham's Report.
- 'REPRESENTATION BY POPULATION', 279, 281, 295.
- REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT, its advent in British North America, 80; in Lower Canada (1792-1838), 88-115; in Upper Canada (1792-1838), 117-55; its failure in the Canadas, 156-66; and Durham's criticism, 165; in Maritime Provinces, 169-73; in the Pacific colonies, 332, 334.
- REPUGNANCY, DOCTRINE OF, 522-7.
- RESERVATION OF BILLS, 82, 379, 501.
- RESIGNATION OF MINISTERS, 382.
- RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT, adumbrations of under Craig, 95; adumbrations of in Lower Canada, 100, 112, 113; no hint of in the ninety-two resolutions, 109; refused by Gosford's Commission, 112; and Russell and ten resolutions, 113, 177, 179, 183-4; adumbrations of in Upper Canada, 144, 161; Bond Head's conception of, 151-2, 177; supported by the Toronto Examiner, 168 note 2; Durham and, 174, 175-6; Howe's letters on, 180-1; and Russell-Sydenham dispatches, 183-4, 188-9, 200, 202, 204; and the Sydenham-Harrison Resolutions, 204-5, 213, 218, 237, 238, 242, 244; and Bagot, 215, 225, 227, 233; its implications refused by Metcalfe, 232; La Fontaine's conception of, 237-8; and the Elgin-Grey régime, 2, 251-3, 254, 255, 256; in Nova Scotia, 265-6; in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, 267-8; its grant creates problems, 273; its widening sphere in the Canadas, 274-8; distinguished from self-government, 278; its stagnation in the Canadas, 278-82, 283-4, 292, 293; in North-West territories, 330; in the Yukon, 331; in British Columbia, 334, 336.
- Responsible Government in the Dominions*, by A. B. Keith, 407 note 2, 415 note 4, 429 note 1, 434 note 3.
- REVENUE CONTROL ACT, (1 & 2 William IV, c. 23), enacted, 106; its repeal recommended by Gosford for Lower Canada, 112; and Upper Canada, 144; its repeal recommended by Head for Upper Canada, 152.
- RICHARDSON, J., his Eight Years in Canada, 288 note 3.
- RICHELIEU, ARMAND JEAN DU PLESSIS, CARDINAL DE, (1585-1642), and colonial affairs, 7; and Company of New France, 9.
- RICHMOND, CHARLES LENNOX, FOURTH DUKE OF, (1764-1819), governor of Canada (1818-19), his conflict with Lower Canadian assembly, 101.
- RIDDELL, THE HON. JUSTICE W. R., editor of La Rochefoucault-Liancourt's Travels, 118 note 1; author of Mr. Justice Thorpe, 120 note 1; his account of Gourlay, 131 note 1; author of The Law of Marriage in Upper Canada, 139 note 1; his judgements quoted, 426 note 1, 427, 428; his Constitution of Canada, 427 note 4, 428 note 2, 430 note 3.
- RIEL, LOUIS, (1844-85), 327-8.
- ROBERTSON, SIR C. G., 564 note 2.
- ROBERVAL, JEAN FRANÇOIS DE LA ROQUE, SIEUR DE (1500?-60?), his charter, 8.
- ROBINSON, SIR JOHN BEVERLEY, BART., (1791-1863), chief justice of King's Bench (1829-62), opposes union (1822), 103; solicitor-general and attorney-general, 128; his promotion to the bench, 141; his promotion complicates the political situation, 144; his proposals for legislative union, 400; his Plan for a General Legislative Union, 400 note 4.
- ROBSON, PROFESSOR W. A., 480 note 5.
- ROGERS, SIR FREDERIC, see Blachford, Baron.

- ROGERS, HON. N. McL., 528.
- ROLPH, JOHN, (1792-1870), Upper Canadian reformer, 139, 141, 147; appointed to Head's executive council, 151; enters Hincks-Morin ministry, 263.
- ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, under Peace of Paris (1763), 3, 39, 40, 41; under the Quebec Act, 3, 51, 57; and Act of Supremacy, 3, 51, 92, 103; under the capitulation of Montreal and the 'régime militaire', 30; and Murray, 35, 41; concessions to, 42; under Carleton's instructions (1775), 57; under the Constitutional Act, 82; opposes extremes, 109, 114; in Upper Canada, 118; deciding factor in Lower Canadian Rebellion, 160-1; its status under the Act of Union, 198; its separate schools, 282, 313, 314, 433-4.
- ROSE, SIR JOHN, (1820-88), and federation of Prince Edward Island, 336.
- ROSS, SIR GEORGE WILLIAM, (1841-1914), his conception of the functions of the Senate, 414; his Senate of Canada, 414 note 2.
- ROSS, JOHN, (1818-71), president of the council, on Canadian delegation to England (1858), 286.
- ROUEN, COMPANY OF. See Company.
- 'ROUGE' PARTY IN CANADA EAST, 259, 263, 279.
- ROWELL, HON. NEWTON WESLEY, (b. 1867), 375.
- ROY, J.-EDMOND, (1858-1913), on 'régime militaire', 28.
- ROY, P.-G., (1870-), on local administration in New France, 15 note 1.
- ROYAL COMMISSIONS ACTS OF AUSTRALIA, (1902-12), 409.
- ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES, 517-20, 563.
- RUPERT'S LAND, constitutional provisions for its inclusion in the dominion, 322; and Rupert's Land Act and Act for the temporary government of, 325, 326; formally transferred to the dominion, 329.
- RUSSELL, LORD JOHN, afterwards first Earl Russell, (1792-1878), secretary for war and the colonies (1839-41), introduces the ten resolutions, 113-14, 177; introduces bill for the temporary government of Lower Canada, 115; the political effect of his ten resolutions, 114, 156, 166; and responsible government, 113, 166, 177, 179, 183-4, 204; and Howe, 180-1; issues Sydenham's instructions, 183; his dispatch on the tenure of public offices, 184, 187, 196, 267; omits municipal clauses from Act of Union, 193; and French language, 198; his interest in Bagot, 210; supports Metcalfe, 246; defends Elgin, 259; his outlook rebuked by Elgin, 261; and American civil war, 292. See also Grey . . . third Earl.
- RUSSELL, PETER, administrator of Upper Canada, (1796-9), and land grants, 120.
- RYERSON, ADOLPHUS EGERTON, (1803-82), and position of the Anglican church, 139; leads Methodists into constitutional paths, 147, 152-3; his Story of my Life, 153 note 1; defends Metcalfe, 244; his Sir Charles Metcalfe defended, 244 note 2; rallies the Methodists to Metcalfe's support, 246.
- RYLAND, HERMAN WITSIUS, (1760-1838), civil secretary of governors of Canada (1793-1813), his anti-French policy, 94-5; urges repressive measures, 97; complicates political issues in Lower Canada, ib.; and Act of Supremacy, 103.
- SANKEY, RT. HON. LORD, 494, 521, 552.
- SASKATCHEWAN, PROVINCE OF, created, (1905), 324, 330; unicameral legislature in, 391; franchise in, ib.; and divorce, 396.
- SAUNDERS, ADMIRAL SIR CHARLES, (1713?-75), 23.
- SCHLOSBERG, H. J., 542 note 1.
- SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF, and the 'clergy reserves', 139, 191.
- SCOTT, PROFESSOR F. R., 526 note 1.
- SCOTT, W., his Canadian Constitution historically explained, 432 note 1.
- SCROPE, G. POULETT, (1797-1876), his Memoir of Lord Sydenham, 182 note 1, 185 note 4, 187 notes 3, 4, 188 note 4, 189 notes 1, 2, 3, 190 note 2, 191 note 1, 192 note 1, 193 note 1, 194 note 1, 195 note 1, 196 note 1, 197 note 1, 199 notes 1, 2, 201 note 1, 204 note 1, 215 note 1.
- SECESSION FROM THE EMPIRE, 'Right' of, 448-9, 540-4.
- SECRET SOCIETIES BILL, and Metcalfe crisis, 241, 242, 243.
- SEIGNIORIAL SYSTEM, in New France, 19-24; and tenures, 19-20; and administration of justice, 20-1; estimate - of its feudal aspects, 21-2; abolition of its tenures, 22, 262, 263, 264.

- SELF-GOVERNMENT, distinguished from responsible government, 278.
- SELKIRK, THOMAS DOUGLAS, FIFTH EARL OF, BARON DAER AND SHORTCLEUGH, (1771-1820), and Red River colonization, 323.
- SENATE OF CANADA, see Canada, Dominion of, and Ross, Sir George.
- SENATE OF UNITED STATES, see United States of America.
- SEPARATE SCHOOLS, J. S. Macdonald's bill, 282, 314; in the Yukon, 331; their constitutional position, 314, 433-4. Seventh Report on Grievances, 147, 148.
- SEWARD, WILLIAM, (1801-72), his foreign policy during the civil war, 291, 292.
- SEWELL, JONATHAN, (1766-1839), chief justice of Lower Canada (1803-38), his anti-French policy, 94; his Plan for a General Legislative Union, 400 note 4.
- SEYMOUR, FREDERICK, (d. 1869), governor of British Columbia (1864-9), and union of Pacific provinces, 334; and federation, 334, 335. See also Howay, F. W.
- SHEFFIELD, CITY OF, its protest against Canadian tariff policy, 273-4.
- SHERBROOKE, SIR JOHN COAPE, (1764-1830), governor of Canada (1816-18), his conciliatory policy, 100; appoints Roman catholic bishop to the council, ib.; his financial policy and the assembly, 100-1; his anxiety over Gourlay's activities, 133.
- SHERMAN, WILLIAM TECUMSEH, (1820-91), his march through Georgia, 301.
- SHERWOOD, HENRY, (1807-55), and Bagot, 223; forms ministry with Daly, 247; his defeat, ib., 255.
- SIMCOE, JOHN GRAVES, (1752-1806), first lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada (1792-9), 84; divides province into electoral districts, ib.; his dispute with Dorchester, 91, 119; opens first Upper Canadian legislature, 117, 191; lays the foundations of the social religious and institutional life of the province, 117-20, 138; mistrusts popular government, 118-19; dislikes the 'elective principle', 119; his conceptions of government prove detrimental, 161.
- SIMPSON, MRS. ERNEST, 555-7.
- Sir Charles Metcalfe defended*, by E. Ryerson, 244 note 2.
- Sir Robert Peel from his private Papers*, by C. S. Parker, 221 note 1.
- Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal Party*, by Sir J. S. Willison, 329 note 3, 344 note 1.
- SKELTON, OSCAR DOUGLAS, (b. 1878), his Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, 157 note 1, 329 note 3, 344 note 1, 355 note 1; his Life of Sir A. T. Galt, 285 note 1, 286 note 1, 287 note 1, 314 note 1, 316 note 1; and interpretation of the constitution, 494-5.
- Sketch of Lord Durham's Mission to Canada*, by Charles Buller, 167 note 2.
- SMALL, JOHN E., solicitor-general for Canada West, 224.
- SMITH, SIR ALBERT JAMES, (1824-83), and federation in New Brunswick, 311.
- SMITH, GOLDWIN, (1823-1910), quoted, 283, 412; his Canada and the Canadian Question, 412 note 1.
- SMITH, SAMUEL, (1756-1826), administrator of Upper Canada (1817-18), 129, 133.
- SMITH, WILLIAM, (1728-93), chief justice of Lower Canada (1786-93), 76; proposes a kind of federal union of British American colonies, 79, 400.
- SMITH, WILLIAM, author of The Struggle over the Laws of Canada, 1763-83, 53 note 2.
- SMUTS, RT. HON. JOHN JAN CHRISTIAN, (b. 1870), and the 'right' of secession, 448.
- SOUTH AFRICA, and appeals to the privy council, 399; and secession, 448; and changes of its constitution, 450; its unitary type of constitution, 455.
- SOVEREIGN COUNCIL, see New France.
- SOVEREIGNTY, PROBLEM OF, 2, 165, 179, 250, 431; discussed in relation to Canada's status, 454-7. See also Laski, H. J.
- SPEAKER, of Senate, 385; of commons, 389.
- Speech of Lord Lyttelton on a Motion . . . for a repeal of the Canada Bill*, 67 note 2.
- Standing Rules . . . of the Legislative Assembly of Canada* (1841), 198 note 2.
- STAMP, SIR J., 462.
- STANLEY, see Derby, Earl of.
- Statistical Account of Upper Canada*, by Robert Gourlay, 84 note 5.

- STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER, 484, 495, 514-39, 560, 562.
- Statutes, Treaties . . . of Canadian Constitution*, by W. P. M. Kennedy, 484 notes 1 and 2, 489 notes 1 and 2.
- STATUTES OF: Trade Union Acts, 462.
Combines Legislation, 462.
Canada-France Convention Act, 464.
Canada-France Trade Agreement Act, 464.
Offensive Weapons Act, 464.
Pensions Act, 464.
- ST. LAURENT, S., and appeals, 526.
- ST. LOUIS, Castle of, at Quebec, 19.
- Story of my Life*, by Egerton Ryerson, 153 note 1.
- ST. PAUL, McDougall retreats to, 328.
- ST. PIERRE, ISLAND OF, 32.
- STRACHAN, JOHN, (1778-1867), Anglican bishop of Toronto (1839-67), opposes union (1822), 103; member of the executive and legislative councils, 128; opposes Gourlay, 132, 133; his 'ecclesiastical chart', 139, 140, 141; Colborne's estimate of, 143; and clergy reserves, 190, 262; and secularization of university, 242.
- STRATHCONA AND MOUNT ROYAL, DONALD ALEXANDER SMITH, FIRST BARON, (1820-1914), and Canadian Pacific Railway, 337; his death, 358.
- STRONG, SIR SAMUEL HENRY, (1825-1909), chief justice of Canada (1892-1902), 417.
- Struggle over the Laws of Canada, 1763-1783*, by William Smith, 53 note 2.
- STUART, ANDREW, 109.
- SUBSIDIES TO PROVINCES, 304, 307, 314.
- SUITS BY AND AGAINST THE CROWN, 482.
- SULLIVAN, HON. ROBERT BALDWIN, (1802-53), attacks Ryerson in the Metcalfe crisis, 244; his Letters on Responsible Government, 244 note 2.
- SULPICIAN, ORDER OF, (founded 1640), 10.
- SULTE, BENJAMIN, (b. 1841), his estimates of the number of settlers in New France, 12 note 1; on 'régime militaire', 28 note 7.
- SUPERIOR COUNCIL, see New France.
- SUPREME COURT OF CANADA, its establishment, 341; its organization, 394-5; and appeals, 395; and 'New Deal', 546-51.
- Survey of British Commonwealth Affairs*, by W. K. Hancock and R. T. E. Latham, 561 note 1.
- SWAYZIE, ISAAC, his perjured evidence against Gourlay, 134.
- SYDENHAM, CHARLES EDWARD POULETT THOMSON, FIRST BARON, (1799-1841), governor of Canada (1839-41), his experience and qualifications, 182; his instructions, 183-4; summons special council of Lower Canada, 184-5; believes arbitrary government suitable for Lower Canada, 185; his dismay at Lower Canadian apathy, ib.; meets legislature of Upper Canada and addresses its assembly, 186; his important interview with Sir George Arthur, 187 note 4; makes public the dispatch on the tenure of public offices, 187; carries proposals for union in Upper Canada, ib.; his political methods, ib., 188, 189, 194-6, 200-2, 205-9; his discretion over 'responsible government cry', 188; his conception of responsible government and of the status of the governor, 188-9; and clergy reserves, 189-91; closes last legislature of Upper Canada, 191; his anxiety over the chaos in Lower Canada, 192; approaches La Fontaine, 193; and municipal system and registry offices in Lower Canada, 193-4; tours Upper Canada, 194-6; in Nova Scotia, 196-7; his practical dealings with the legislature of United Canada, 201-2; his resolutions on responsible government, 204-5; criticism of his system of government, 205-7; Bagot's estimate of his régime, 207-9; the testing of his system, 210-29; Memoir of, see Scrope, G. Poulett.
- SYDNEY, THOMAS TOWNSEND, FIRST VISCOUNT, (1733-1800), 50.
- SYNDICS IN NEW FRANCE, bring element of popular control into council, 10; Colbert advises their suppression, 16.
- TACHÉ, ALEXANDRE ANTONIN, (1823-94), bishop of St. Boniface (1853-71), archbishop (1871-94), and Red River Rebellion, 327.
- TACHÉ, SIR ÉTIENNE PASCAL, (1795-1865), prime minister of United Canada (1851-7), forms ministries, 264; his defeat and political progress, 293-5; presides at the Quebec conference, 300; his death, 310.
- TACHÉ, JOSEPH CHARLES, (1821-94),

- gives publicity to the federation idea, 289; his Provinces de l'Amérique du Nord et d'une Union fédérale, 289 note 2.
- TALON, JEAN, (1625-91), intendant of New France (1665-8, 1670-2), arrival, 13; his colonization policy, 19.
- TARIFFS, and Earl Grey, 253; Hincks and, 273; Galt and, 273-6; Canadian control over conceded, 276; and federation, 290-1; preferential, 346, 347, 349.
- TASCHEREAU, HON. L., and constituent powers, 515.
- TAUNTON, HENRY LABOUCHERE, FIRST BARON, (1798-1869), colonial secretary (1855-8), 272.
- TEN RESOLUTIONS OF 1837, 113, 114, 156, 166, 177.
- TENURE OF JUDICIAL OFFICE, 379, 394.
- THIRTEEN COLONIES, THE, their government, 1; their independence influences development in British America, 2, 71, 74; their political development, 22-3; and taxation, 47, 51; and the powers granted under Quebec Act, 54; their revolt, 56; and boundaries under the Quebec Act, 62-3; their influence on Carleton's political conceptions, 59-62; their revolt influences the Quebec Act, 63-5, 67; and first continental congress, 63; their status in the empire affords no lessons for the present, 447.
- THOMPSON, SIR JOHN SPARROW DAVID, (1844-94), minister of justice (1885-94), 393 note 2, 419, 420.
- THOMSON, CHARLES EDWARD POULETT, see Sydenham, Baron.
- THORPE, ROBERT, judge of the Court of King's Bench, Upper Canada, (1805-7); article on, by Mr. Justice Riddell, 120 note 1; his public agitation, 122; his opinion on the state of the province, 122-3; his political dealings with juries, 123; his election campaign, 123-4; estimate of, 125-6.
- THREE RIVERS, CITY OF, (founded 1634), its representation under the Constitutional Act, 88.
- THREE RIVERS, DISTRICT OF, under the French régime, 15; under the 'régime militaire', 26-7.
- TILLEY, SIR SAMUEL LEONARD, (1818-96), at Quebec conference, 300; his political errors over federation, 308; promotes negotiations between Macdonald and Howe, 319; visits England, 344.
- TITHES, Canadians grow negligent in paying, 30; under the Capitulations of Montreal, 40.
- TORONTO, CITY OF, incorporated, 146; Liberal conventions at, 289, 317.
- Toronto Examiner, The*, in favour of 'responsible government', 168 note 2.
- TORONTO, UNIVERSITY OF, 242.
- TOWNSHEND, THOMAS, see Sydney, Viscount.
- TOYNBEE, PROFESSOR A. J., 486 note 1.
- Travels in Canada*, by La Rochefoucault-Liancourt, 118 note 1.
- TREATIES, dealing with trade and commerce, 344-50, 446, 451; political, 351-2, 446, 451; war, 370-2, 452; present position and procedure, 511-13, 547, 552; see also Boundaries and Canada, Dominion of.
- 'TRENT AFFAIR', (1861), 276, 291.
- TROOPS, IMPERIAL, see Defence and Militia.
- TUPPER, SIR CHARLES, BART., (1821-1915), favours union of maritime provinces, 298; arranges conference at Charlottetown, 209; at Quebec conference, 300; and federal proposals in Nova Scotia, 309, 311-12; and first federal cabinet, 318; and first federal election, ib.; opposes Howe in London, 319; visits England, 344; high commissioner and negotiator of treaties, 347; his Recollections, 344 note 1, 351 note 1, 382 note 1.
- TUPPER, SIR CHARLES HIBBERT, (b. 1855), his Position of the Privy Council, 398 note 3.
- Two Ways of Thinking*, by Lord Macmillan, 483.
- UNIACKE, JAMES BOYLE, turns reformer in Nova Scotia, 196.
- UNION ACT OF 1822, its terms, 103; its fatal policy, 165; its failure, 400.
- UNION ACT OF 1840 (3 & 4 Victoria, c. 35), enacted, 193, 198; analysed, 198; brought into force, 199; Stanley's conception of, 226-7; its 'veto power' modified, 253; its weaknesses, 2, 280-2.
- UNITED EMPIRE LOYALISTS, 2, 69, 71, 74, 76, 80, 119, 127, 128.
- UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, feel loss of

- Quebec, 75; early anti-British party in, 91; immigration from to Upper Canada, 119, 127-8; and Reciprocity Treaty, 4, 261, 290; and Canada during the civil war, 276-7, 291-2; its tariffs and Canadian federation, 290; its constitution, 302, 303, 402, 403, 410, 414, 416, 432, 440, 455; and North-west, 324; and Canadian status in treaty-making, 351; its senate, 413; its judiciary, 393, 415.
- Use and Abuse of Some Political Terms*, by G. C. Lewis, 431 note 1.
- VANCOUVER ISLAND, and Hudson's Bay Co., 331; and representative institutions, 332; and union with British Columbia, 333-4; and responsible government, 334; and federation, 334-5.
- VERGENNES, CHARLES GRAVIER, COMTE DE, (1717-87), 69.
- VICTORIA, CITY OF, (founded 1843), 333, 334.
- VICTORIA, QUEEN, (1819-1901), her accession stays legislation on eve of rebellion, 114; and Elgin's appointment, 249; opposes intervention in civil war, 292.
- View of the Political Situation . . . of Upper Canada*, by J. M. Jackson, 125 note 1.
- View of Sir Charles Metcalfe's Government*, by E. G. Wakefield, 243 note 3.
- VIGER, DENIS BENJAMIN, (1774-1861), joins Metcalfe's provisional government, 244; his La Crise Ministérielle, 244 note 3; Stanley's estimate of, 245 note 1.
- VIRGINIA RESOLVES, THE, 62.
- VOLTAIRE, FRANÇOIS MARIE AROUET DE, (1694-1778), opposes the retention of Canada, 31.
- WAKEFIELD, EDWARD GIBBON, (1796-1862), his interpretation of the Metcalfe crisis, 243-4; his Letter on the Ministerial Crisis and his View of Sir Charles Metcalfe's Government, 243 note 3.
- WALKER, THOMAS, (b. 1718), outrage committed on, 45.
- WALLACE, WILLIAM STEWART, his Growth of Canadian National Feeling, 339 note 1.
- War Government in the Dominions*, by A. B. Keith, 434 note 3.
- WAR, imperial declaration of, and Canada, 361, 362, 363, 452-3, 540-4; and League of Nations, 374.
- WAR OF 1812, 69, 125, 127, 136.
- WAR OF 1914-18, involves Canada automatically, 362-3; Canada's autonomy preserved during, 363-4; Canadian administrative aid in, 365-9; Canada and its termination, 370-2; no real constitutional developments during, 452.
- WASHINGTON, proposals for a Canadian minister at, 370, 452, 507-8.
- WASHINGTON, TREATY OF, of 1846, 249, 323, 331; of 1871, 344.
- WATSON, WILLIAM, LORD WATSON, (1827-99), 407, 411, 421, 423, 442 note 3.
- WEEKES, WILLIAM, (d. 1807), Upper Canadian reformer, criticizes administration, 121; disputes with Grant, 121-2; his description of General Hunter, 123; killed in a duel, ib.; estimate of, 125-6.
- WEST INDIES, see Company of.
- WESTMINSTER PALACE HOTEL CONFERENCE, (1866), 313-15, 488.
- WILLCOCKS, JOSEPH, (d. 1814), sheriff of the county of York, his dismissal and imprisonment, 124-5; turns renegade, 125; estimate of, 125-6.
- WILLIAM IV, (1765-1837), nominates Sir Charles Grey to the Canada Commission (1835), 110; and elective legislative councils, 111.
- WILLIS, PROFESSOR J., 469 note 2, 474.
- WILLISON, SIR JOHN STEPHEN, his Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal Party, 329 note 3, 344 note 1.
- WILMOT, LEMUEL ALLAN, (1809-78), delegate to England on redress of grievances, 170.
- WILSON, JAMES, of Pennsylvania, (1742-98), at Philadelphia convention (1787), 402.
- WOLFE, GENERAL JAMES, (1727-59), 23, 302.
- WOMEN, see Senate and Nationality.
- WRIGHT, JOHN, (1770?-1844), editor of Cavendish's Debates, 50 note 1.
- WYATT, CHARLES B., surveyor-general of Upper Canada, dismissed by Gore, 124; estimate of, 125-6.

- X. Y. COMPANY, (1795-1804), its trade rivalries, 323.
- YALE, B. C., convention at, in favour of federation, 335.
- YORK, (founded 1793), capital of Upper Canada, 120; Gourlay's convention at, 132, 134; and W. L. Mackenzie, 145-6; incorporated as city of Toronto (1834), 146.
- YORKTOWN, British surrender at, (1781), 56.
- YOUNG, COLONEL, appointed judge by Murray, 26.
- YOUNG, SIR WILLIAM, (1799-1887), and Durham, 169, 172.
- YUKON, its organization and government, 330-1.